The interstate project, launched with great hope in 1956, is intended to link the Nation's cities with a 41,000-mile network of fast, safe superhighways. It will also breathe new life into traffic-choked urban areas, where two-thirds of our population live.

Now critics are proclaiming it "our great big highway bungle," a "nightmare," a "rathole" of waste, and extravagance, and a scandal of such potential that Teapot Dome will be peanuts by comparison. More responsible and restrained critics intone that the program is "in trouble."

The interstate project is in trouble. But it is the relentless effort to discredit the program that has it tottering. Some of the criticism is justified, but fair criticism often is not weighed against accomplishment and progress, and a distorted picture emerges.

Actually, the program, measured in any objective way, is going extraordinarily well, but this side of the story is lost in the storm of abuse.

"No charge has been too thin or too ridiculous to exploit," Bertram Tallamy, Administrator, Bureau of Public roads, said, "Old reports were exhumed and mined for whatever negative comments they might yield."

MANY HAVE AX TO GRIND

"Historic opponents of the highway program welcomed new members, recruited from the disgruntled, the misinformed, and those having some personal ax to grind. A good many of them are vicious and their motivation must certainly raise questions in the minds of neutral observers," Tallamy said.

Forces behind this campaign spring from both industrial and political life, boosted along by some doubtful judgment in the newspaper and magazine business. Those fighting to save the program—on Capitol Hill and within the administration—have searched evidence of a conspiracy in view of the remarkable cohesiveness and cumulative effectiveness of the propaganda, but none has turned up.

"It may not be a conspiracy, but as far as the Interstate System is concerned, it's academic," Representative GORDON H. SCHERER, Republican, of Cincinnati, says. "If this keeps up, they're going to kill it."

SCHERER, ranking Republican of the House Subcommittee on Roads, a part of the Public Works Committee, is one of the most conservative and tightfisted Members of Congress. So his concern over the program's fate is not the routine response of a big spender. He is anything but that and still is convinced the Nation cannot afford to lose the $40 billion interstate program.

MONEY IS ONE OF ISSUES

While SCHERER is a Republican, the political forces at work are not necessarily organized along party lines. Representative GEORGE FALLON, Democrat, of Maryland, ranking Democrat on the Roads Subcommittee, shares this concern. Nor for that matter, is everyone within the Eisenhower administration as determined to keep this program going in its original and bold concept as the two Congressmen.

An explanation of why the interstate program, which promises so much to a nation on wheels, should be the target of abuse must start with money—in this case, the taxes which finance the program. But there are some other issues involved, as well. The winds of controversy were blowing even before the program was implemented by law in 1956, although they didn't reach gale force until last year when the financing bogged down.

Basis for most of the early squabbling was the "needs" formula for apportionment of Federal funds, which replaced the old formula favoring rural States and the political seniority system in Congress. The Interstate System was to be built to answer the needs of the Nation and demands of automotive traffic.

This meant getting people in, out, or through cities, where highway construction is very expensive, as well as between cities, where right-of-way costs are lower. As the Federal Government was going to provide 90 percent of the cost of this Interstate construction, the "needs" concept of distributing the money did not arouse much enthusiasm among legislators from sparsely populated areas.

ARGUMENT OVER URBAN AID

There are still many who object to the fact that 42 percent of the Federal moneys will go toward building only 11 percent of the Interstate mileage which happens to be in congested urban areas. They are not moved by arguments that nearly everybody driving on the highways is heading for some city or town and a system which just dumps them on the outskirts isn't going to be much help.

Nor are they swayed by arguments that, on the basis of traffic volume and mileage, urban projects are more economically justified than rural miles, and that nearly half of the pay-as-you-go money financing the program comes from automobile use on urban expressways, the volume more than making up for the shorter distances.

There also were objections to the pay-as-you-go financing concept of the program, largely from the manufacturers of automotive supplies—tires and other equipment—and the petroleum industry. New taxes were added to their products to go into the highway trust fund, from which Federal aid was to be disbursed to the States on a cash-in-hand basis.

But it wasn't until last year, when the trust fund nearly ran dry and the administration asked for another 1½-cent Federal tax on gasoline to keep the program going, that the propaganda storm broke.

"Immediately some began to look for a scapegoat and whipping boy," SCHERER said. "Some of the people who were responsible at least in part for the financial dilemma yelled the loudest."

ADDED TAX FINALLY VOTED

During the struggle to keep this program solvent and moving ahead by means of an additional tax, most of the charges dwelt on overdesign, waste, and extravagance. This apparently was meant to make it politically hazardous for lawmakers to add a further burden on highway users, since it was claimed the money was going down a rathole. However, an additional 1-cent tax finally was passed, after a prolonged struggle.

During the fight the interstate champions did explain—at least to the satisfaction of a majority in Congress—why the original cost estimates were low and why a program barely under way needed additional financing. Congressman SCHERER, who led the battle on Capitol Hill, gave these five reasons:

The trust fund absorbed about $1.5 billion owing from older highway programs. That was never contemplated when the financing provisions were set up.

Because of the recession in 1958, Congress accelerated the program by $1.6 billion, without facing up to the problem of providing increased revenue.

An additional 1,000 miles was tacked on the original 40,000-mile network—on which the financing was used—to placate legislators who felt their areas were being discriminated against. Again, no additional revenue was considered.

In a number of localities the estimated requirements or standards had to be raised almost immediately because of the increasing number of motor vehicles. Just like the Nation's population, the number of automobiles is growing far beyond what anybody expected just a few years ago, and the Interstate System is being built for traffic in 1975. At that time the Nation will have 110 million motor vehicles, compared to about 70½ million today.

ESTIMATES ONLY A FIRST BASIS

The original estimates were made rather hurriedly by all the States' highway departments in 1954 and there were some miscalculations. More importantly there was a lack of understanding of what building highways to Interstate standards means, even in the cost of small things, such as signs and lighting.

In any case, the estimates were only used as a basis for figuring out the financing system, and a miscalculated estimate does not mean the erring State will be stuck with a low figure or rewarded with a high one. Each mile of road has to be approved by the Federal Bureau of Roads before any reimbursement is made, and this includes the cost.

In addition to that, inflation was a problem. Cost of construction and of right-of-way increased about 12 percent in the period 1954–57—the interval between the two estimates.

Despite logical explanations of what happened to the program in financing, one of the most frequent indictments during this period was that the Interstate Highways were extravagantly overdesigned.

This indictment covered the number and width of lanes, the number of interchanges, the sharpness of curves and grades, and frills, all of which were part of the expensive extravagance.

This indictment usually was accompanied by one or two explanations. The first was that the States were indifferent to expense as long as the Federal Government was going to reimburse them 90 percent of the cost.

IMPORTANT FACT IGNORED

In fact, the more it cost the better; it was worth every dollar to bring $9 in from outside the State. This, of course, ignored the fact that every project must be approved by the Federal Bureau—including its cost—before the State became eligible for reimbursement.

"It also ignores the fact that maintenance of the new highways is entirely a State function and, as a rule of thumb, the more elaborate a highway, the more expensive is the maintenance bill," SCHERER added.

The other explanation was that private consulting engineers, which virtually every State employs to augment its highway department staff while the program is getting under way, and for highly specialized work, are paid on the basis of a percentage of the cost of the projects which they design, so they deliberately made them expensive.

The real answer to these charges was not—and still is not—heard very clearly. In the Highway Act it is clearly stated that the Interstate System shall be built to meet the requirements of traffic in 1957. This was to be the first real attempt to look ahead in highway construction, rather than just catch up, as tradition had it.

Some people, perhaps honestly, just could not visualize American automobile traffic in 1975, even though there have been some pretty good hints. The New Jersey Turnpike, for example, was up to the estimated 1980 traffic level a few years after it opened in 1952.

"We need to build permanence into the new superhighways to protect the multi-billion-dollar investment being made in the Interstate System," warns Charles Noble, chief engineer on the New Jersey superroad and until recently head of Ohio's Highway Department.

STORIES TOLD AND RETOLD

"Probably our most crucial failure in highway construction has been in underestimating traffic," he said. "We have failed to recognize the potential of the automobile and the urgent need for sufficient highway capacity."

But these overdesign and financial issues never really caught the fancy of the more flamboyant critics, and it has been only recently, with the discovery of some scandal, corruption, and boondoggling that the campaign against the Interstate has really heated up.

Some of these cases, which were real failures in the program, are being retold with such regularity that they may eventually become as familiar as "The Little Red Hen."

First among these is the Indiana case, in which members of the highway department improperly used their knowledge of future highway locations to make a profit on land acquisition.

In this scandal, indictments were returned by an Indiana grand jury, and of the $78,802.80 involved in the worst instance, all but $786.51 has been returned to the State.

The other popular favorite is the Skelly bypass case at Tulsa, Okla. Actually, this scandal, involving an estimated $524,000 worth of materials which were never put in the road, was discovered and prosecuted in Tulsa some time before it became part of the big drive against the Interstate.

A new scandal, developing in Massachusetts, involves appraisal of property for rights-of-way.

After these clear-cut cases of wrongdoing, charges against the Interstate program get a little fuzzy. There are the Nevada situations, for example. One involves three interchanges along an isolated section of the road, the other involves the Interstate route at Reno.

FOUND LESS EXPENSIVE

In the case of the interchanges, the Interstate route in question runs parallel to an old highway and a railroad in the Truckee River Valley. Some access to the new Interstate Highway in the area was necessary, and it was found that because of the cramped and rough valley floor it was cheaper to build three interchanges than build a feeder road which would bring the traffic to a single interchange. At that, total cost of these three interchanges is $221,000.

In the Reno case, the issue is whether the Interstate route should go through the downtown area, or along a northern bypass. Because Representative WALTER S. BARING, Democrat of Nevada, wrote to the President declaring the selection of the downtown route would be "the biggest swindle ever perpetrated in the State of Nevada," a special House Government Operations Subcommittee was appointed to investigate the problem.

The subcommittee decided, along with the Bureau and the State highway department, that while the downtown route would be more expensive initially, it was the only one which answered the need. This decision was based partly on the fact that most traffic in the region is bound for the center of Reno, a major tourist attraction. In this Reno presents a different problem from other cities of that size.

While Reno is a special situation, the argument for running the Interstate System around cities, rather than through them, is heard again and again. Examples are cited in Omaha, Macon, Ga., and Wilmington, Del., among others, and it is always the same—building the system into the city is a terrible waste, because bypass routes are so much cheaper.

DON'T ERASE CONGESTION

"But the point is that these bypass routes do not eliminate the traffic congestion, which is the objective of the program," SCHERER said.

"And charges that cutting these rights-of-way through the heart of industrial areas result in tax loss for the community are without foundation.

"The evidence is conclusive that these superhighways so increase property values in the entire area that actually considerably more dollars go into the tax coffers."

Another popular approach in the sabotage of the Interstate System involves the height of bridges. In this, the recurring waste theme is livened up with charges of bureaucratic boondoggling so blatant, in view of one magazine writer, that a single telephone call between the Pentagon and the Bureau of Public Roads could have prevented construction of 2,000 undersized bridges and underpasses. There also is the suggestion that this bureaucratic failure is damaging to our national defense.

As a matter of fact, this problem was handled honestly but not particularly adroitly by either the Bureau or the Department of Defense. But the trouble was that nobody knew the size and shape of weapons to come—weapons, such as missiles, which might be moved on the Interstate System—and they still don't know. Charges that the two organizations just weren't in touch on the problem are preposterous.

DECIDED ON 14-FOOT CLEARANCE

The military and the Bureau have been jockeying back and forth on the matter of bridge and overpass heights since 1922, almost from the beginning of the Federal-aid program. There was regular liaison on the matter from 1949 through 1956, when a minimum of 14 feet was decided upon. As late as October 1, 1957, the Army, Navy and Air Force all said the 14-foot clearance was adequate for anticipated equipment.

With the coming of the space age and its oversized vehicles, another look soon was in order and the Bureau determined on January 27, 1960, that the minimum height was to be 16 feet, rather than 14. Critics claim this tardy decision will cost the taxpayers $730 million, but the Bureau can't see where that figure comes from.

On the basis of official Bureau figures, if all the bridges authorized from the start of the interstate program until January 27, 1960, were reconstructed or reengineered, it would cost about $176 million. But the total is not expected to come to that because alternate routes around many of the overpasses will eliminate the need to change the height.

When the military was put under fire about this waste, Perkins McGuire, Assistant Secretary of Defense, wrote that when the decision was made in 1957 to accept 14 feet, "it was clearly understood by the military departments, the States, and the Bureau of Public Roads that some of the military items of equipment exceed 14 feet when loaded on available highway vehicles.

"But no one believed there was sufficient justification to request changing the vertical clearance standard and increasing further the cost of the Interstate System," McGuire said.

MOSTLY ABOUT ATLAS TRANSIT

Actually, most of this controversy involves the Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile, which is made in San Diego, Calif., but has been fired mostly from Cape Canaveral, Fla. Moving the big missile across the country by highway does create a number of clearance problems, and there is no question about that.

When the trucker who has this moving contract appeared before the special House subcommittee investigating the program, he testified that it took 9 days and cost $12,000 for him to deliver one Atlas missile to Canaveral.

But when the subcommittee got Lt. Gen. Ben Schriever, of the USAF Research and Development Command, to testify on this problem, he said the size of military missiles will be getting smaller than the Atlas from now on, as rocketry advances, and future space exploration vehicles will be far too big to move overland at all.

He agreed with the general proposition that it is possible to move a bigger load under a higher bridge, but he could offer no definite figure as the minimum practical height of all bridges on the Interstate System. This has been the difficulty all along—guessing a practical minimum without knowing the shape of things to come—and there is no assurance that someone won't want to move 17-foot military loads across the country right after the 16-foot bridge level is established in concrete.

While the decision to go to 16 feet might have been made earlier, there is little justification in this case for the wild charges made against the entire program and the Bureau, any more than there was in the other cases.

ALL PART OF BROAD ATTACK

But they all seem to be part of the broad attack to discredit the program, to make the public suspicious because of the bungling, resentful of the taxes already imposed because of the waste, and, most important, unwilling to bear any further taxes on highway users or the products they buy.

The billboard business, railroads, or various individuals—such as the disgruntled or publicity minded politicians or clever writers—may have their own reasons for sniping at the program, but the big push springs from the taxation issue.

"Some of the groups and industries who want these highways and who will benefit perhaps more than anyone else contributed to the throttling of the program right at the height of the crisis," SCHERER said.

"The American Automobile Association, the trucking and oil industries have always contended that they contribute in user taxes more than their just share of the cost of the program. Further, AAA and the truckers have had a little private fight of their own, each accusing the other of coughing up disproportionate amounts," he said.

"These three beneficiaries made an all-out campaign against the additional tax when the President asked for the 1½-cent increase. The petroleum industry felt so strongly that it cut off its nose to spite its face by joining with those who for political and other reasons charged that the entire program was permeated with waste, inefficiency, and fraud," the Congressman declared.

REMARKABLY FREE OF WASTE

Despite the outcry, the Interstate program is remarkably free of waste and irregularities, particularly in view of its historic size and the traditional, double-jointed Federal-State arrangement. Further, it is coming along well. Some 8,800 miles or one-fifth of the system now is open to traffic, roughly one-half of it new construction since the program started 4 years ago. The other half is toll roads and expressways already built, which are on designated interstate routes and are up to interstate standards, such as the New York Thruway and most of the Ohio Turnpike. These roads simply were incorporated into the system.

Authors of the 1956 act expected difficulties would arise in such an enormous undertaking and they ordered two comprehensive studies to be made at the time legislation was passed. These reports will be made to Congress next year. They should provide unbiased, solid information on every controversial question plaguing the program. Answers are expected on these issues:

What will be the ultimate cost of the Interstate System, now that State highway departments have had time, and the experience, to come up with careful estimates?

Are ordinary motorists paying too much or too little of the cost?

Are commercial users too much or too little?

Should the tax base be broadened to include more than users, such as owners of land adjoining the system who stand to benefit greatly?

Should the standards—number and width of lanes and number of access points, as examples—be increased or cut back?

Should the 90–10 reimbursement formula be changed?

ANSWERS TO COME IN 1961

Answers to these questions certainly should resolve most of the honest controversy battering the Interstate program. They should be available next year, though it may not be that every interest will agree with them.

What the defenders want to do is keep the program from being forced onto the rocks and fatally damaged in the public eye before knowledgeable and fair corrective action can be taken.

They do not claim there is no waste in the world's biggest public works program, nor that it is free of fraud.

"What seems only fair is that the failures of the program be measured against what success there has been, so the people of the Nation will have a basis to judge its progress and worth, as well as a basis for understanding what must be done to improve it," Tallamy said. "In view of the importance of the Interstate program to the Nation, it seems little enough to ask."

MINIMUM WAGE BILL

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of highly commending and congratulating the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] for the fairness, reasonableness, and understanding he has demonstrated during the past months in order to get a carefully thought-out minimum wage bill before this body. In my many years of service in the House of Representatives I have truthfully never been as impressed as I have been with the efforts and hard work of Mr. Roosevelt. He not only knew the subject at hand, but he also has shown a remarkable degree of patience and desire to be objective. He has also demonstrated the rare quality to listen to all arguments with seriousness and objectivity.

In rising to pay tribute to my colleague, I want to state I supported the committee bill. It was a moderate, well-thought-out proposal based on lengthy hearings and subsequent work by the Subcommittee on Labor Standards and the full Education and Labor Committee. Thus it had not been presented to this body in haste.

The committee bill was much better because I believe it would be patently unfair to ask newly covered workers to work unlimited hours without protection from overtime and give such protection, now in the law, to those presently covered.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to stress the fact that, contrary to misleading statements by self-serving groups, the Roosevelt bill did not bring under its coverage the independent or small business enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that the Roosevelt proposal was voted down on a close vote yesterday, the gentleman from California made an excellent presentation and explanation of his bill.

THE LATE ALBERT E. REITZEL

Mr. BOSCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOSCH. Mr. Speaker, the United States has lost a great citizen. I refer to Albert E. Reitzel who served our Nation from 1923 until his retirement in 1955. Even after his retirement, he continued to serve; the committees of Congress had his valuable counsel and knew that he was always available for consultation in the field of immigration law and problems, a field in which he qualified as an expert in every sense of the word. The yeoman work he did in this field will always be a memorial to his life and career.

Mr. Reitzel in March of this year wrote an article for the Steuben News, official publication of the Steuben Society of America of which he was a member, which is one of the clearest explanations of immigration law, procedures, and problems that I have ever read. Our distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] saw fit to insert a goodly portion of the aforesaid analysis in the RECORD and thus preserved it for posterity.

To the family and friends of Albert E. Reitzel I extend my deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

THE LATE JOHN O'GRADY, U.S. CONSUL IN BRISBANE, AUSTRALIA

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to present herewith an editorial from the Greensboro Record of Greensboro, N.C., written by Mr. Bruce Jolly, the Washington correspondent for the Greensboro, N.C., Daily News. This excellently written editorial by Mr. Bruce Jolly relates to the recent death in an airplane accident of Mr. John O'Grady, the U.S. consul in Brisbane, Australia.

Mr. O'Grady was a native of my home city of Lowell, Mass. In Lowell, he received his early education and later he chose as a career the U.S. State Department. His work in the State Department and in representing the United States abroad was distinguished by the force and energy and determination he used in his effort to excellently present the United States to the people of the country to which he was accredited. I am proud Mr. O'Grady was a native of Lowell, Mass. In Lowell he had many friends and relatives, all of whom are shocked to learn of his untimely death.

Following is the very fine editorial by Mr. Bruce Jolly:

(By Bruce Jolly)

WASHINGTON.—To most people, the name John O'Grady meant nothing. With the exception of a privileged few, those who were his colleagues in the Department of State and those who knew him as a friend, his name in recent headlines announcing the crash of an Australian airliner that cost his life and all others aboard probably brought only a passing moment of regret.

But big, freckled John O'Grady, with his ready grin and agile mind, personified the best in U.S. representatives abroad who are completely devoted to their duties, and who sacrifice themselves in the ever-increasing battle of presenting the United States in its best light.

O'Grady was U.S. consul in Brisbane. He was a State Department career man who loved his job in part because he loved people.

MINUTE PREPARATIONS

Before he left for Australia, John O'Grady weighed every move that he might make so that, when he arrived, he would be in a position to show the Nation at its best.

When it came to purchasing an automobile for use in Australia, he rejected tempting buys of foreign cars at half the price he had to pay to purchase an especially made U.S. car with a right-hand drive—a requisite in that country.

He did so because he was convinced that it would reflect on the United States if he, as a U.S. representative, were to drive a foreign-make car.

For hours, John O'Grady listened to recordings of great American orchestras and to true folksongs. He wanted to take with him the best and most representative presentations of the country's truly great musical attainments, for he knew that in too many instances this Nation's cultural capacities are suspected.

He worked with his family so his children would be familiar with the area to which they were being sent, and not be caught short on their knowledge of Australian geography and the virtue of cricket.

He did these things because he had the background and experience that indicated the need for them. It was this same John O'Grady who, when in Greece, arduously learned that country's folk dances, and performed them with the lumbering grace of a once star athlete from his native Lowell, Mass., to the delight and applause of his foreign friends.

DEATH IN A FOG

John O'Grady died in a plane that crashed into an Australian bay during a fog. The plane was only a short distance, as distance is measured airwise, from the field for which it was headed. There were 34 people on the plane. None survived.

O'Grady was the rule, rather than the exception. There are others by the scores who are doing the same kind of job, operating in midechelon positions, behind the headlines, going generally unsung.

To a certain extent, it is they who carry the brunt of the U.S. errors that are made by tourists and by the Nation's military representatives. It is they who must justify and attempt to explain the bitterness and the prejudice that all too frequently occur in a nation that stands as a symbol of friendliness and freedom to a large part of the world. It is they who must point out the diversities in Congress that freedom of selection brings, and guide those in foreign countries to judge by the whole product rather than the spoutings of the few.

Perhaps that is the real tragedy in the death of career men like John O'Grady. Today, he represents the kind of men the Nation needs. There are many of them, but there still aren't enough.

THE LOWELL, MASS., FIRE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I spoke on Monday of the tremendously spectacular fire that took place just two buildings from my office in Lowell, Mass. I spoke of the heroism of the chief of the fire department, Mr. Fracis Kelleher, who directed the firefighting. In the beginning the fire was completely out of hand. It was a roaring, raging fire. It did not seem possible that anyone could survive. The picture which I have in my hand shows the fire when it was raging at its worst, but the firemen, with the help of other cooperating firemen from other towns in my district, got it under control and eventually put it out. They performed herculean service.

I spoke of certain persons the other day who showed great heroism and great executive ability. I would like to speak again of the head of the fire department at Lowell, who directed all the firefighting activities, and of the firefighters from other towns in my district and from the U.S. Air Force firefighters from Bedford in my district who volunteered their services. I would like to speak also of the action by the police department in Lowell that worked tirelessly, getting people out of the way who had been overcome by the fire, by the fumes, by the smoke. And I would like to tell the people here that nobody was seriously injured and nobody was killed. It is almost beyond belief that that could have happened in such a raging fire. It was a miracle. But the firemen put a moat of water around the building.

I would like to speak of the very great and efficient action of our postmaster at Lowell, Mr. James Gallagher, who sent away his disabled veterans who worked there, those who had any difficulty with their lungs. Then he put one of the post office custodians, Mr. Kenneth Earle, and Arthur Garrabedian on the roof with hose and fire-protection apparatus. Nothing happened to the post office building. That would have gone also if it had not been that they had got the fire under control or if the wind had changed.

Then there was the auditorium beyond, the Lowell Auditorium. That would have gone, too, if they had not had the fire under control.

I am so sincerely grateful to the Lowell people for their wonderful self-sacrifice and their real heroism and for the way in which they adjusted themselves to the demands of this terribly spectacular fire.

The Lowell Sun Newspaper Building where I have my office, was so very near the fire and the people in it, like the owners, Mr. John and Mr. Clement Costello, behaved remarkably when they had burning sticks coming over on their window ledges. But still they kept the fire away, and remained calm.

I have such pride, Mr. Speaker, in my Lowell people. I wish you all knew them. They are modest and great Americans.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Government Operations be given permission to file three reports up until midnight, Saturday, July 2. The reports are entitled, first, "Civil Defense Shelter Policy and Postattack Recovery Planning"; second, "Personnel Practices and Procedures in the Internal Revenue Service—Des Moines, Iowa, District Office"; third, "Federal Home Loan Bank Board Seizure of Long Beach Federal Savings and Loan Association."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, during the general debate on Wednesday, June 29, in consideration of H.R. 11405, with Senate amendments, the chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee asked unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration. The amendment permits the application of any person originally eligible to apply for national service life insurance to make a new application within 1 year after January 1, 1961, upon the submission of evidence of good health at the time of such application, and the payment of the required premiums.

It developed there was objection from the gentleman from California, a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee [Mr. SMITH].

At page 15002 of the RECORD, a member of the Insurance Subcommittee stated that the subcommittee studied the legislation "at great length" and "unanimously turned it down."

Mr. Speaker, I rise, as a member of that subcommittee, to make this statement in order to prevent any possible inference that I was against the reopening of national service life insurance. There was no action of the subcommittee that "turned down" anything. There was a motion to defer action at the time because of statements by staff counsel that Senator LONG's amendment would be proposed; and to await developments in the Senate. Because of use of the words "unanimously turned down" by the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH], it could be interpreted that I was opposed to the reopening. Instead I wish to state that I am in favor of reopening national service life insurance, because it is only fair that this old right be revived as to those who, because of some hardship, had to drop this insurance in years past. This reopening is not a handout or a giveaway. It is not even a Government subsidy. This reopening cannot injure private insurance companies because there is no expansion of any rights but only the reinstatement of an old right. I sincerely hope the House has the opportunity to vote upon the granting of this right to reopen national service life insurance.

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the Captive Nations Week, which is being observed throughout the country during the third week of July, has become a significant and momentous week. The observance of this week serves as eloquent expression of our wholehearted sympathy for all peoples enslaved by the Kremlin's Communist tyranny.

The peoples of central, Eastern, and southeastern Europe, numbering about 100 million in all, were living freely in their historic homelands before the outbreak of the last war. They were doing their best in building democratic institutions in their respective countries, and thus were contributing considerably to the spread and strengthening of democratic forces in their countries. But the war and the catastrophic events succeeding that war, proved fatal to their freedom. By one blow, one might say, all of them were caught and trapped behind the Iron Curtain, treacherously devised and effectively maintained by the Communists' totalitarianism. That is what makes the lot of numerous nations living between the Baltic and Black Sea so tragic, and their future so closely linked with that of the Soviet Union.

Since the end of the last war the people of this country, through their Government, have exerted tremendous forces with a view of relieving the misery and eventually assuring freedom to these peoples. Short of war, the Government of the United States working in cooperation with the governments of the free West, has done its utmost to have the Soviet Unicn to allow freedom to these peoples. Unfortunately, all these efforts have been of no avail, and today they are no more free than they were before we began to champion their righteous cause. But we have not given up hope, and we firmly believe that the captive nations of Europe will eventually regain their freedom. Until that day, the people of this country and their Government will continue to observe annually Captive Nations Week, so long as these peoples are denied the right of their becoming the masters of their destiny. On this day we once more dedicate ourselves to the task of freeing these enslaved peoples from Communist totalitarian tyranny.

THE FEDERAL MUTUAL SAVINGS BANK BILL

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RAINS], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURKE], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARRETT], the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the gentleman from New York [Mr. FINO], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] have joined me today in introducing a bill to establish Federal mutual savings banks.

In order to carry out more effectively its responsibilities to the Nation for promoting maximum employment, production, and purchasing power, the Congress must facilitate and encourage an increased flow of real savings to finance housing and other capital formation on a sustainable, noninflationary basis. These increased savings necessary to the security and welfare of the individual, as well as the Nation, should be provided within the private institutional framework of our competitive economy. The objective of increased capital formation through thrift can be advanced by the extension of the mutual savings bank system.

This bill therefore provides for the chartering of mutual savings banks by the Federal Government.

These new banks would be privately managed, federally supervised and insured institutions organized to supplement the efforts of State-chartered mutual savings banks. Like their State counterparts, these banks would specialize in the encouragement of thrift and would channel savings for investment in private home financing, Government securities, redevelopment, and other capital formation. This bill is being introduced at the end of this session so that between now and the next session interested groups will have an opportunity for the careful study that this program merits.

Banking in the United States has in a sense emulated our Federal system of Government by evolving along two separate lines—State and National—and this dual banking system has, as much as any other single factor, contributed to the vitality of our financial institutions. We have State commercial banks and National commercial banks. We have Federal and State savings and loan associations. The dual chartering system extends to credit unions as well. Mutual savings banks alone exist as State institutions exclusively and then only in 17 States.

Mutual savings banks have a special appeal and a special skill in the encouragement of thrift which has been aptly demonstrated in States where these banks now exist. In those States, per capita holdings of thrift accounts generally are higher than in other States in the United States. The 17 mutual savings bank States are all included in the 25 States with the highest per capita holdings of thrift accounts. Denial of these thrift facilities to individuals in the 33 nonsavings bank States seems unwarranted—especially since both population and personal income are rising rapidly in these States and capital needs are greater than ever before.

Since mutual savings banks exist in only 17 States, it is probable that some general comments toward an explanation of mutual savings banks would be helpful.

Mutual savings banks are called mutual because they are organized without stockholders. The effect of this is that all earnings, after provision for adequate reserves, are distributed to depositors as interest on their deposits.

Traditionally, mutual banks have not accepted checking accounts and have not made commercial unsecured loans. Their sole function is to encourage thrift and to stimulate the flow of savings into productive investment.

Management is by boards of trustees. Members of these boards are generally prohibited by law and by the principles of trusteeship from commercial dealings with their bank. The organizers of the bank usually constitute the first board, which thereafter elects new members as vacancies occur. The board establishes bank policies, elects officers, determines interest rates, and supervises investments, all subject, however, to Government regulation and examination.

First organized in the United States in 1816, mutual savings banks are the Nation's oldest type of thrift institution. They were formed originally by philanthropic, public-spirited men who saw a need for providing safe depositories for the savings of those people of moderate means whom the larger banks were not interested in serving.

The mutual savings bank industry has the finest record of safety to depositors of any type of banking industry in the history of this country. It has survived wars, depressions, bank panics, and the booms and busts of nearly a century and a half.

Though operating in only 17 States, these banks today serve over 22 million accounts and have more than $35 billion on deposit. Although they are authorized to exercise diversified investment powers, they hold $25 billion in mortgage loans and in the 14-year period since the end of World War II have invested a greater proportion of the funds available to them in mortgages than have any of the other major types of financial institutions. An estimated $5 billion of these loans are on properties in States other than the States where mutual savings banks are located. For instance, there are no mutual savings banks in California, Michigan, or Georgia, but mutual savings banks hold well over $1 billion in loans to California homeowners, about $300 million to Michigan homeowners, and over $200 million to Georgia homeowners. This kind of record should suggest to us what can be done for thrift and home financing by extending these banks to all 50 States.

Following is a section-by-section analysis of my bill H.R. 12913:

SECTION 1. TITLE

The bill is entitled the "Federal Mutual Savings Bank Act."

SECTION 2. DECLARATION OF POLICY

The legislative purpose of establishing a system of Federal mutual savings banks is to promote thrift and utilize the accumulation of thrift deposits for home financing and other investments.

SECTION 3. DEFINITIONS

Certain terms, such as "financial institution" and "thrift institution," which have a special significance in the act, are defined in this section. "Financial institution" includes a "thrift institution" and also commercial banks, trust companies, and insurance companies. "Thrift institution" includes State-chartered mutual savings banks, cooperative banks, homestead associations, and mutual savings (building) and loan associations, and Federal mutual banks.

SECTION 4. THE FEDERAL MUTUAL SAVINGS BANK COMMISSION

This new independent Government agency would consist of three members appointed by the President for staggered terms of 6 years. The Commission would supervise the chartering of Federal mutual savings banks and their subsequent operation. Each member would be required to devote his entire time to the business of the Commission and would be prohibited during his term of office from serving in any capacity in any financial institution. No more than two members of the Commission could belong to the same political party at the time of appointment.

SECTION 5. COMMISSION POWERS

The Commission would be empowered by this section to adopt and amend rules and regulations for its own operation and for the operations of member banks of the system. This section contains a general grant of power and is further supplemented throughout the bill by various specific powers.

SECTION 6. CHARTERING OF MUTUAL BANKS

Application for a Federal mutual savings bank charter would be required to be subscribed to by 5 signatories from a minimum of 21 corporators. This minimum would not apply in the case of the conversion of a preexisting thrift institution. The Commission would be empowered to grant a charter after finding that a Federal mutual savings bank would serve a useful purpose in the community, that there was reasonable expectation of its success, and that its operation would not unduly injure existing thrift institutions. All Federal mutual savings banks would be required to include the words "Federal," "mutual," and "savings" in their title. Federal mutual savings banks would be permitted but not required to become members of the Federal Home Loan Bank System.

SECTION 7. CORPORATORS

The ultimate authority in a Federal mutual savings bank would be the board of corporators. Corporators would be divided into three classes of equal size and would be elected for staggered terms of 10 years. The Commission would be empowered to prescribe standards of conduct for corporators. The Board would not be charged with the actual management of the bank; its principal function would be the election of the trustees.

SECTION 8. TRUSTEES

The board of trustees of a Federal mutual savings bank would be charged with the responsibility for policy management of the bank. Trustees would be elected from among the corporators for staggered terms of 3 years. No person acting as trustee of a Federal mutual savings bank would be allowed to hold office as a trustee, director, or officer of another thrift institution. Trustees would be prohibited from receiving any remuneration as a trustee except fees for attendance at meetings or for service as a member of a committee. Further, they would be prohibited from borrowing funds from the Federal mutual savings bank unless the loan were secured by the assignment of a deposit or share account in a thrift institution. Finally, these trustees would be prohibited from making any profit from any property sold to or services performed for the Federal mutual savings bank or in connection with any loan made by the Federal mutual savings bank. The Commission would be empowered, in equitable circumstances, to make exceptions from the restrictions on trustees.

SECTION 9. COMMENCEMENT OF OPERATION

No Federal mutual savings bank would be permitted to commence operations until it had qualified as an insured bank under the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. No Federal mutual savings bank would be permitted to continue operations if it should at any time cease to be so qualified. Prior to commencement of operations, an expense fund would be required to be advanced in cash to the credit of the Federal mutual savings bank. Contributions to this expense fund would be evidenced by deferred payment certificates, which could be repaid in such installments and at such interest as the Commission approved. The expense fund would be available for the payment of operating expenses until such expenses could be paid out of the bank's earnings.

SECTION 10. RESERVE FUND

In addition to the expense fund which would be utilized for operating expenses of the Federal mutual savings bank, a reserve fund would be required to be advanced in cash to the credit of a Federal mutual savings bank and would be available for the sole purpose of meeting losses. The minimum amount of the initial reserve fund would be $50,000. The actual size of the reserve fund would depend on Commission standards and also on the requirements of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Each Federal mutual savings bank would be required to add to this reserve fund out of net earnings whenever the reserve fund did not equal 12 percent of deposit liabilities. Sums advanced to the initial reserve fund would be evidenced by deferred payment certificates and would be repayable in such installments and at such interest as the Commission provided.

SECTION 11. BORROWING

A Federal mutual savings bank would be empowered to borrow funds subject to Commission regulation.

SECTION 12. DEPOSITS

A Federal mutual savings bank could accept any savings deposit, could reject sums offered for deposit, could repay deposits at any time, and could classify and differentiate among deposits on such bases as it determined. Interest on deposits could be paid from net earnings and undivided profits. A Federal mutual savings bank would be empowered to require advance notice of withdrawal.

SECTION 13. INVESTMENTS

A Federal mutual savings bank would be empowered to invest in Government, State, and local obligations, obligations of agencies of the United States and the States, Canadian obligations, title I notes, in conventional mortgages subject to certain restrictions such as loan-to-value limitations and total aggregate investment, insured mortgages, and secured promissory notes. Corporate securities investment would also be subject to certain restrictions, such as minimum maturity and total aggregate investment.

In addition to the investment powers specifically set forth, the Commission would be empowered, by regulation, to grant Federal mutual savings banks authority to make further investments, but the Commission would not be empowered to restrict investment powers to limits more stringent than those set forth in the bill. The types of investment specifically mentioned in the bill, therefore, represent a minimum grant of power.

SECTION 14. BRANCHES

With the approval of the Commission, a Federal mutual savings bank could establish one or more branches in the State of its principal office, but only to the same extent that any State-chartered financial institution accepting funds from savers was authorized to establish branches. Before approving any branch application the Commission would be required to make the same findings as provided for in the case of a charter application. Branches and offices operated as of conversion, merger, or consolidation could be continued in operation. Rights to branches or offices could also be retained.

SECTION 15. CONVERSION

Any thrift institution could convert itself into a Federal mutual savings bank provided that such conversion was in accord with the laws under which the converting thrift institution was organized and providing also that the Commission approved. Before approving any such conversion, the Commission would be required to find that the institution seeking conversion had the ability to discharge the duties and to conform to the restrictions upon Federal mutual savings banks and had previously so conformed to the extent required by the Commission. The institution would be empowered to retain and service all accounts lawfully held by it on the date of its conversion. Federal mutual savings banks would be empowered to convert into any type of thrift institution, but such conversion would be subject to approval of any regulatory authority having jurisdiction over the type of thrift institution into which the Federal mutual savings bank sought to convert. Federal mutual savings banks would not be permitted to convert unless the State laws applicable to the thrift institution into which the Federal mutual savings bank sought to convert permitted reciprocal conversions to Federal mutual savings banks without approval by any State authority. The approval of the Commission would not be required for the conversion of a Federal mutual savings bank into another type of thrift institution.

SECTION 16. MERGER AND CONSOLIDATION

Any two or more Federal mutual savings banks or any one or more Federal mutual savings banks and one or more State-chartered mutual savings banks would be permitted to merge or consolidate. The approval of the Commission would be required where the surviving or consolidated institution was to be a Federal mutual savings bank and the approval of the appropriate State authority would be required where the surviving or consolidated institution was to be a State-chartered mutual savings bank. However, no Federal mutual savings bank would be permitted to merge or consolidate when the surviving or consolidated institution was to be a State-chartered mutual unless under the law of the State in which the Federal mutual savings bank was located, State-chartered mutual savings banks could participate in mergers or consolidations without approval by State authority when the surviving or consolidated institution was to be a Federal mutual savings bank.

SECTION 17. GENERAL POWERS

Federal mutual savings banks would be granted certain operational powers and incidental powers appropriate to the achievement of the objects and purposes of a Federal mutual savings bank. Further, a Federal mutual savings bank would have the authority to exercise all the powers possessed now or hereafter by any State-chartered mutual savings bank chartered by the State in which the Federal mutual savings bank was located. A Federal mutual savings bank would also have the authority to exercise powers defined by the Commission as generally possessed now or hereafter by State-chartered mutual savings banks.

SECTION 18. ANNUAL REPORT

The Commission would be required to submit an annual report to the President for transmission to the Congress.

SECTION 19. EXAMINATION

The Commission would be required to conduct an annual examination of each Federal mutual savings bank provided that the Commission could accept for any year in lieu of such examination an examination by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

SECTION 20. TAXATION

No State, territorial, county, municipal, or local taxing authority would be permitted to impose any tax on Federal mutual savings banks greater than that imposed by such taxing authority on other similar local mutual or cooperative thrift and home financing institutions.

SECTION 21. AUTHORITY TO APPOINT CONSERVATORS AND RECEIVERS

The Commission would be empowered to take possession of a Federal mutual savings bank and appoint a conservator or receiver whenever it appeared that such Federal mutual savings bank (1) had violated any provision of the act; (2) was conducting its business in an unauthorized, unsound, or unsafe manner; (3) was in an unsound or unsafe condition to transact its business; (4) had neglected or refused upon proper demand to comply with the terms of any order, rule, or regulation of the Commission; (5) had refused to submit its records and affairs for inspection by the Commission or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. If the Commission determined to appoint a receiver it could only appoint the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. In the event the Commission took possession of a Federal mutual savings bank, any officer of such Federal mutual savings bank would have 10 days to apply to the local U.S. district court for an order requiring the Commission to show cause why it should not be enjoined from continuing possession and if a conservator or receiver had been appointed, why such appointment should not be vacated. The district court would be granted jurisdiction to hear such cause and to grant appropriate relief.

SECTION 22. SEPARABILITY

If any provision of the act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance should be held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to any other person or circumstance would not be affected thereby.

SECTION 23. RIGHT TO AMEND

The right to alter, amend, or repeal the act is expressly reserved.

The following is a summary of the bill:

This act would authorize the chartering of mutual savings banks by the Federal Government. These new banks, like their State-chartered counterparts, would be organized without capital stock, and their earnings, after provision for adequate reserves, would be entirely distributed to depositors.

This act creates the Federal Mutual Savings Bank Commission, a new independent agency, which would supervise the chartering and operations of Federal mutual savings banks. A charter could be granted whenever the Commission found that a Federal mutual savings bank would serve a useful purpose in a community; that there was reasonable expectation of its financial success, and that its operation would not unduly injure existing thrift institutions. Before commencing operation, a Federal mutual savings bank would be required to qualify as an insured bank under the FDIC.

These new banks would be managed by a board of trustees, elected from among a board of corporators. Trustees would serve for staggered terms of 3 years. Trustees would be prohibited from receiving remuneration as trustees; from borrowing funds from the bank; and from making a profit from any property sold to or services performed for the bank or in connection with any loan made by the bank.

Before commencing operation, each Federal mutual savings bank would be required to have an expense fund for initial operating costs and a reserve fund which would be available solely for the purpose of meeting losses. This reserve fund would be added to through annual increments from net earnings until the fund amounted to 12 percent of deposit liabilities. The new banks would be authorized to borrow funds subject to Commission regulation and would be permitted, though not required, to join the Federal Home Loan Bank System.

The banks could accept any savings deposit and pay interest from net earnings and undivided profits. They would be authorized to invest in mortgages, Government obligations, State and local obligations and corporate securities, subject to restrictions contained in the act. The Commission would be empowered to expand the investment authority.

Federal mutual savings banks could establish branches to the same extent that State-chartered financial institutions accepting savings funds were authorized to do so. Provision has been made in the bill for the conversion of thrift institutions into Federal mutual savings banks and for the reciprocal conversion of Federal mutual savings banks into thrift institutions. Federal mutual savings banks will be authorized by this bill to merge or consolidate with other Federal mutuals or State-chartered mutuals.

In addition to the powers specifically accorded Federal mutual savings banks by this bill, they would be authorized those powers held by State-chartered mutual savings banks in the State of their principal office. Further, the Commission could define certain powers as being generally possessed by State-chartered mutual savings banks and could authorize these powers for Federal mutual savings banks.

The Commission would be required to conduct an annual examination of the new banks but could accept, in lieu of such examination, an examination by FDIC.

The Commission would be authorized to take possession of a Federal mutual savings bank whenever it appeared that the bank was violating a law or regulation or was in an unsound or unsafe condition. However, the mutual bank would have the right to immediate judicial review of any such action by the Commission.

AUTHORIZATION FOR SPEAKER AND CLERK TO ACT DURING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the adjournment of the House until tomorrow the Clerk be authorized to receive messages from the Senate and that the Speaker be authorized to sign any enrolled bills and joint resolutions duly passed by the two Houses and found truly enrolled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER PROCEDURE

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to make a general observation. For the past several days and on many other occasions during this session of the Congress I have witnessed unanimous consent requests being made for Members to be granted special orders at the conclusion of the day and at the same time asking unanimous consent that they may revise and extend their remarks.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that when such remarks appear in the RECORD, merely because no objection is made at the time a second party requests that a special order be granted, and that the person to whom the remarks are credited is granted permission, by unanimous consent, to revise and extend his remarks without having actually appeared on the floor, that there is a violation of the rules governing insertions in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which is increasingly becoming not—and I repeat not—a record of what is happening in the House. And, I also want to take this opportunity to remind the House that I have introduced legislation in the form of a resolution which would eliminate some of the abuses which have occurred and would return to the custom that we have observed in the past, when a person could look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and have some feeling of assurance that the party whose name appeared there had actually appeared here on the floor and had at least obtained personal permission to address the House. I would not go so far as to say that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it has appeared has been phony but I do contend that it is not a record of what occurs in the House of Representatives, and I hope that beginning next session I will have the cooperation of the Members to bring about some changes in the rules which will restore an order that should have been observed long ago. Before the convening of the 87th Congress, I hope to have compiled some statistics, indicating the extent to which these abuses have grown, and will have suggestions in the form of a resolution which I hope will be favorably considered and acted upon by the proper committee, and approved by the House.

COMMUNICATIONS ACT AMENDMENTS FOR 1960

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, on last Tuesday, the Committee of the Whole had before it S. 1898, Communications Act Amendments of 1960. On page 14761 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that day appears the text of an amendment I offered to section 6 of that measure, page 24, line 13. The effect of my amendment was to strike from the bill a provision that a cease and desist order of the Federal Communications Commission could be enforced by the imposition of a fine up to $1,000 for each day that a respondent failed to observe the orders of the Commission. And I called attention to the fact that this would establish a novel, and I thought dangerous, precedent.

Mr. Speaker, conditions were such with debate and amendments having been limited to 15 minutes, with many desiring to talk, that I was able to get only 1 minute to explain that amendment. And since it was a technical amendment, dealing with legal procedure, it was, perhaps, difficult to make completely plain to all of the members of the committee precisely the limitations and the purposes of the phraseology that I wanted to strike.

I had made some study of this matter and had made inquiry as to whether any commission possessed such power of enforcement of its own cease and desist orders by the imposition of a forfeiture, and I had been unable to uncover anything in the law.

I consulted the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress and their Legal Division. I had a law student who works part-time in my office check with the Legislative Reference Service. I had discussed it with counsel of the Committee on the Judiciary and with the legislative counsel and with some of my colleagues on the Committee on the Judiciary, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], whose judgment on matters of administrative procedure I respect very highly. I felt quite sure that my statements were correct, but I understand that in the minute or so I had to explain them they might not very well have been put across to the Members of the House.

I take this time because this measure will go to conference, I assume, with the Senate, and I would hope that the conferees on the part of the House will give serious thought and consideration to this particular provision and if it does establish a novel precedent for the enforcement of cease and desist orders of administrative tribunals I hope the conferees on the part of both Houses will give very careful thought to that rather important step before it is taken.

Subsequent to the discussion and some discussion which followed mine in the RECORD I had occasion to make further inquiry, and I have discussed the present existence of this authority in the administrative tribunals with the counsel of certain of the administrative tribunals, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, and the Federal Power Commission. I must hasten to point out that in these and other laws there are many provisions for forfeitures for the violation of law which are commonly enforced by civil proceedings brought by the U.S. Attorney, but in a more restricted and limited sense, even with this subsequent inquiry, I have been unable to discover that any board or commission has the power of forfeiture with respect to enforcement of its own cease-and-desist orders.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEADER. I am very happy to yield to my colleague from Georgia.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the comments of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER]. At this point I should like to say that I concur with the remarks he has just made. At the same time I should like to say that following the comments of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER] I as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce took the floor very briefly, a matter of actually less than 30 seconds, to oppose the amendment which the gentleman from Michigan had offered. I am sure the gentleman from Michigan will agree with me that unfortunately for the full and adequate discussion of the important amendment which the gentleman offered both the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Georgia were limited in time to such an extent that it was altogether impossible to discuss the merits of the amendment the gentleman from Michigan offered.

If the gentleman from Michigan had had adequate time he would have delivered the speech which I know he had already prepared, because the gentleman from Michigan is very careful on these matters over which his committee and the committee on which I serve have in some instances almost concurrent jurisdiction. I know of the gentleman's diligence and I know of his ability, and I want to commend him on both of them.

I certainly want to say to the gentleman that if he had had sufficient time to have included all of his remarks during the time he had the floor in support of his amendment I certainly would not have made a portion of the statements which I made following the remarks which the gentleman actually made rather than those which he would have made.

I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan does have considerable merit. If and when there is a conference between the House of Representatives and the other body on this bill, S. 1898, it is my pleasure to give the gentleman my personal assurance that I shall be glad to call to the attention of those who may serve as conferees on the part of the House not only the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan but the scholarly discussion of it which he included in the RECORD of June 28, 1960, on page 14761, together with the comments which the gentleman made on the floor of the House today.

I would like to say further that if in the limited time which was available to both the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Georgia, the gentleman from Georgia did any injustice to the gentleman from Michigan it was not intentional and I make whatever apology may be necessary.

Mr. MEADER. I certainly thank the gentleman for his very gracious remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

STATEMENT OF GOVERNOR NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER ON GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, the Governor of the State of New York, Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, testified before the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery of the Senate Committee on Government Operations on the subject of Government reorganization. His testimony was brilliant and the recommendations he made were thoughtful and penetrating. In order that my colleagues in the House will have the benefit of Governor Rockefeller's statement I insert the text of the Governor's statement in the RECORD at this point.

STATEMENT BY GOV. NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER TO SUBCOMMITTEE ON NATIONAL POLICY MACHINERY OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS, OLD SENATE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C., JULY 1, 1960

I deeply appreciate this opportunity to appear before the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery of the Senate Committee on Government Operations.

This subcommittee is performing an outstanding service to the Nation. The Nation's problems, the world's problems, press upon the policymakers in Washington with ever-increasing urgency and in ever-growing complexity.

In seeking solutions to these problems, there can be no substitute for able men in Government—men of vision, of capacity, of courage. But not even the best of men can perform to the fullness of their abilities, nor will men of ability be attracted to Government or encouraged to stay in Government, if inadequate organization frustrates accomplishment. Thus, in its extensive exploration into the question of improving the organization of Government, this subcommittee is addressing itself—importantly, constructively, and with nonpartisan objectivity—to a fundamental need of this Government in dealing with a world of danger, of opportunity, and of fantastically rapid change. That need is to provide a framework within which able men can perform the great deeds demanded by the challenges of our times.

I know from personal experience that no man is more deeply concerned with this question than President Eisenhower. During the 6 years of my chairmanship of the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization, 14 reorganization plans presented by the President were adopted by the Congress. The President's vision, breadth of concept and creativity made possible the substantial advances in Government organization achieved in recent years. In addition, they have profoundly influenced the thought behind specific proposals I shall make to this subcommittee today, although, naturally, I alone assume responsibility in recommending these proposals for your consideration.

With recommendations from the President, the Congress at its next session should, as a first order of business, set about adapting the Government's machinery to the needs, the urgencies, the demands for decisive action that the times require. I am confident that the work of this subcommittee will be of great value in accomplishing this.

As a fundamental step to be taken either at this Congress or at the next, I recommend the extension of the Reorganization Act of 1949, which expired last year. This legislation provided the basis for the reorganization plans adopted in the last decade, and should be renewed.

Governmental reorganization is necessarily a matter of cooperation between the legislative and executive branches. Understandably, it is a matter in which many toes will get stepped on, many vested interests within the Government feel imperiled. The blunt truth is that—despite all past progress—the present structure of the Federal Government is still not geared to support the President in developing and executing integrated policy, thoughtfully and purposefully, either in the complex areas of national security and foreign policy, or in the equally complex area of domestic affairs.

Few realize the tremendous load the President carries in his multiple responsibilities as chief of state, Chief Executive, Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, the man constitutionally responsible for the conduct of our foreign policy, and leader of his political party. More than 50 departments and agencies of the Government report directly to the President. Their number imposes upon him an almost impossible burden—in the need to resolve conflicting approaches and divergent advice, and, from such sources, select and set a determining course of action.

In an effort to bring order to this array of agencies, a host of interdepartmental and interagency committees has been set up. These have come to number approximately 160 in the field of international affairs alone. In fact, international affairs involve, one way or another, the activity and responsibility of every department of our Government. There are also some 18 independent agencies, as well as sundry boards and commissions, involved in aspects of international affairs. The field of foreign economic aid alone involves as many as four Government agencies—and six international financial organizations.

This overelaborate pattern of interdepartmental committees has been designed over the years in an earnest effort to meet the legion of complex problems in both foreign and domestic affairs. The simple fact is this: The committees of a democratic government cannot hope to meet or to master these problems by simply trying to outnumber them. The critical need is for a revamped structure of Government.

The fact, today, is that the structure of our Government too often moves slowly, even sluggishly, to meet this world of swift-moving change. It tends to be stiff and static—when it should be quick, alert, and creative. There is, therefore, a growing public awareness and concern about the structure of Government and the efficiency of its decisionmaking process. And one great proof of this public concern and interest is the existence—and the work—of this committee.

With all this in mind, I deeply believe that the time has come when we can look forward to achieving important reforms at the next session of the Congress.

I have no illusions about the complexity of these tasks. In the light of my own experience in Federal Government, and having undertaken, as Governor of New York, that State government's first reorganization in 30 years, I am well aware of the toughness of the problems. Yet I believe very strongly that both the clear need of the Nation and the quickened concern of the people make this a necessary, and a realistic, time for action.

Let us proceed, then, to the major specific areas of action—both foreign and domestic. For in both these areas the structure of Government demands reorganization to assist the President in wisely formulating and effectively executing national policy. As early as 1955, former President Herbert Hoover recognized this sweeping need by suggesting the creation of two appointed Vice Presidents with specific responsibilities respectively for foreign and domestic affairs. This problem was given active and detailed study by the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization while I was Chairman of that Committee.

I welcome this opportunity to make the following recommendations in these two important fields:

1. Foreign affairs and national security:

(a) Creation of the post of First Secretary of Government to assist the President in the exercise of his authority in this whole area.

(b) Further reorganization of the Defense Department to achieve unified doctrine, planning and command.

2. Domestic affairs:

(a) Creation of the post of Executive Assistant to the President, to be head of a newly created Office of Executive Management.

(b) Consolidation, in certain areas, at the departmental and agency level, of functions now scattered among various Government agencies, particularly in such important fields as transportation and water resources.

I. FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Let us examine briefly how further— and more forceful—support may be given to the President in his constitutional responsibility for the formulation, coordination and conduct of foreign policy.

The problem

The problem is too complex to be soluble by simply adding more authority or more power or more functions to the Department of State. Foreign operations involve the Department of Defense and other major departments and agencies—each with its own special concern, and attitude toward, international problems.

The crux of the problem is to help develop a coordinated Presidential policy and program which can then be administered, on a day-to-day basis, by the existing agencies of Government. The proliferation of agencies and committees in this whole field has tended to increase and complicate—rather than ease and clarify—the burden upon the President in defining and directing policy. The reason is obvious. The more numerous and varied the sources of divergent advice and advocacy—from departments, agencies, committees and individuals—the less chance or time has been left to the President for reflective, overall, long-range defining of purpose and planning of policy.

The proper role of the committee, in our Government, is a subtle and delicate one. The system of committees, of course, works well in the Congress: it is basic to the legislative process, providing mechanism for concession and consensus as well as means for mustering votes for final legislative decision. And committees also have a proper and important place in the executive branch—either by sharing counsel among those empowered to act, or by conducting ad hoc studies on specific problems.

But excessive government by committee can be anything but constructive. In the field of executive action, it can reduce the level of government action to the least bold or imaginative—to the lowest common denominator among many varying positions. In such circumstances, policy may be determined not for the sake of its rightness—but for the sake of agreement. And then the bold and imaginative action most needed, in these critical times, becomes least probable or possible.

The objectives

The essential objectives are three.

First. In support and furtherance of our national purpose, we must integrate fully, at the Presidential level, the international political, diplomatic, economic and social, military, informational, cultural and psychological aspects of foreign affairs.

Second. We also must relate and integrate these matters—from the perspective of the responsibility of the Presidency—with all of our compelling domestic concerns—economic or social, financial or regulatory—as all these affect our national conduct in the world.

Third. We must provide the governmental structure that can effectively assist the President in developing objectives and policies, in all the area of foreign policy and national security, so clear and so thoughtful that they will give unified and purposeful direction to America's unique role in serving—and enhancing—the future of freedom.

The recommendations

To achieve these objectives—vital equally to our national security and our world role—I recommend two broad courses of action.

1. I recommend creation of the post of First Secretary of the Government to assist the President in exercise of his constitutional responsibility and authority in all the area of national security and international affairs.

This means—in more explicit detail—the following:

(a) The First Secretary should be appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

(b) He should have statutory designation as Executive Chairman of the National Security Council.

(c) He should exercise authority as delegated to him by the President, and subject to withdrawal of such authority by, and at the will of, the President.

(d) He should be empowered, at the discretion of the President, to act for the President in international matters at the prime ministerial level, with the Secretary of State operating on the level of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs.

(e) He should have a staff of his own and be empowered to use and reorganize all of the interdepartmental planning machinery of the Government in the area of national security and foreign affairs.

While the First Secretary, deriving his authority from the President and acting on his behalf, would have a status above that of the cabinet, the operating responsibilities of cabinet officers would not be changed. Thus, the Secretary of State would continue to be in charge of the day-to-day conduct of diplomacy. So, too, the Secretary of Defense would continue to be in the direct line of Presidential command of the Armed Forces.

As Executive Chairman of the National Security Council, the First Secretary could be delegated the authority, by Executive order or by legislation, to appoint the chairmen of such supporting groups as the Operations Coordinating Board, the Council on Foreign Economic Policy, and the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems.

2. I recommend the reorganization of defense planning and command to achieve, under the President, unified doctrine and unified direction of forces.

More specifically, this means the following:

(a) The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff should be designated Principal Military Adviser to the Secretary of Defense and the President, and be responsible for development of overall strategic doctrine.

(b) The staff of the Joint Chiefs should be organized on a unified basis under direct authority of the Chairman.

(c) All officers above the rank of brigadier general or the equivalent should be designated officers of the Armed Forces of the United States—not the individual service of their earlier careers—and their promotion should be placed in the control of the Department of Defense.

(d) Full authority should be given to the Secretary of Defense over all military research, development, and procurement, so that he may assure the most productive utilization of research and development funds.

(e) The budget process of the Defense Department should be revised so that Congress appropriates all funds to the Secretary, thereby fixing in him a focus of fiscal responsibility similar to that held by other Departments.

II. DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

The urgencies are as clear and great in the area of domestic affairs as in the areas of foreign affairs and national security. Here, too, the President needs the service and support of a structure of Government more effectively assisting him to define national purpose and executive national policy, in meeting the swiftness and the complexity of the problems and challenges of our time.

The problems

Such is the nature of this period of history that the problems confronting the Government have seemed to multiply even faster than the agencies created to cope with them.

To be specific:

There is the sheer number of departments and agencies reporting to the President—in essentially domestic affairs, no less than 8 departments and some 40 agencies.

There is the ever-widening scope of problems confronted within the Executive Office of the President itself. This Office includes such diverse duties as those of the Bureau of the Budget, the President's Assistant for Personnel Management, other specialized officials within the White House Office, the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, and the Council of Economic Advisers.

There is the constant and ever more difficult task of resolving conflicts between program objectives and budgetary limitations.

There is the ever-increasing volume of legislation pending in the Congress each year, including legislation proposed by the President—all reflecting new problems, freshly and forcefully challenging all departments of Government.

And there is the need for thoughtful long-range planning and development of policy—made ever more difficult, and ever more necessary, by problems ever more complex.

The objective

The President alone simply cannot undertake to meet the volume of problems and functions today demanding his attention, study, and action. To ignore this fact would be to strain the structure of our Government at its very apex—to allow it to be weak where it must be most strong.

The essential objective, then, is to give to the President a strong supporting structure within his own office for policy formulation and concrete decision.

A second objective is to assure that, at the level of the departments and agencies themselves, there is an organizational structure adapted to meeting the key domestic problems of today.

The recommendations

1. I recommend the creation of the post of Executive Assistant to the President and Director of the Office of Executive Management, to assist in planning and management in the sphere of domestic affairs.

There should be created immediately under the President a new Office of Executive Management. Five key functions should be transferred to the new Office of Executive Management, to be carried out by five bureaus created within the new Office. Each bureau should be under the direction of a noncareer official appointed by the President. The Director of the new Office would report directly to the President.

Under the plan I propose, these five bureaus and their functions would be:

(a) Bureau of the Budget:

Functions: Budget formulation and administration.

(b) Bureau of Legislative Clearance and Coordination Functions: The review, clearance, coordination and development of legislation proposed by the executive branch, and of the administration's position with respect to other legislation pending in Congress.

(c) Bureau of Program and Planning Functions: Development and coordination of recommendations concerning executive branch programs, including participation in long-range studies and planning.

(d) Bureau of Organization and Management Functions: Coordination and improvement of the organization and management functions of the executive branch, including accounting and statistical programs.

(e) Bureau of Personnel Management Functions: Assistance to the President in exercising his leadership in personnel management throughout the executive branch.

The Office of Executive Management, if created along these lines, would serve the President more effectively than the present structures of government in the general management of administrative matters, including budgetary, personnel, planning and organizational activities. The Office would assume the functions of various units within the Executive Office of the President and would, over a period of time, remove the need for numerous temporary staff arrangements established to meet special problems.

Even with an ideal organizational structure at the White House level, the President's responsibilities with respect to domestic affairs cannot, any more than in the field of national defense, be effectively performed without sound organization at the departmental and agency level. All too often the location of a particular function within a department or agency is more a matter of history than of logic. Thus, in a number of areas improved governmental machinery is essential to sound policy development in meeting the critical and emerging problems of today and tomorrow.

In these areas:

2. I recommend the consolidation of functions which are now scattered among various government departments and agencies, particularly in such important fields as transportation and water resources.

The field of transportation is a good example because of its critical importance to the growth of our economy in time of peace and to the defense of our Nation in time of war. In spite of general recognition of the importance of transportation, we still do not have today a single focal point within the Federal Government for the formulation of overall national transportation policy, accompanied by broad powers to develop such policy and coordinate the activities of other agencies.

To remedy this, I recommend the creation of a new Department of Transportation, to which would be transferred all governmental transportation functions now located both inside and outside the Commerce Department. These transferred functions would include all the responsibilities of the Federal Aviation Agency, as well as the present promotional and administrative functions of the regulatory agencies: the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Federal Maritime Board.

Another example—equally clear—is the area of water resources policy, where a dispersion of responsibilities has made the development of a coordinated and coherent government policy very difficult.

III. CONCLUSION

I have outlined—briefly—a program of some specific measures to assist the President and the executive branch of the Federal Government in meeting the clear responsibilities and compelling challenges before it.

I believe such measures will enable the executive branch, in all areas of national policy, to give direction more firm and unified, and decision more swift and thoughtful.

No citizens are more keenly aware than you, gentlemen, of what is ultimately at stake here. The matters discussed seem technical or mechanical. They rise, in ultimate meaning, far above this level. They are tests—practical tests—of whether free government can work, and can work well. They are tests that come at a time when the processes of freedom—the workings of democracy—stand under fire and under challenge in the world at large. They are tests that we, as a people and as a nation, can and must meet.

JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS DURING SUMMER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALPERN], is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, the other day in the House I commented on the summer-jobs-for-youth situation. I told of my letter to the AFL–CIO and to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers urging their cooperation in stimulating job opportunities for our high school students during the summer.

There is no question but that constructive work and the self-confidence and satisfaction it brings with it would go a long way toward curbing juvenile delinquency.

If every employer and union would take special pains to help fill jobs for young people on a temporary basis, they would be performing an outstanding service, not only to the young people directly involved but to the community.

In this regard, I would like to cite the tremendous public service performed by the New York Journal-American in its summer-job-for-youth campaign. Not only is this distinguished daily newspaper highlighting the problem and widely publicizing the vital needs and advantages in providing such jobs, but it has been publishing actual job opportunities they have been enlisting as a result of its campaign.

My hat is off to the Journal-American for taking these positive steps.

Let us hope that labor and management, that business, large and small, will respond to this call for action.

PANAMA INTRIGUE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in an address to the House on June 23, 1960, and subsequently, I revealed the determination of subordinate elements in the Department of State to engage in the treacherous act of raising the Panama flag over the Canal Zone in disregard of specific provisions of an act of this Congress and in violation of our treaty rights.

Because wresting control of the Panama Canal from the United States is a prime Communist objective for the takeover of the Caribbean, this announced intention is evidence of subversive influences in the Department of State that calls for immediate investigation by cognizant committees of the Congress.

In order that the Congress may be informed of the latest developments with respect to the Panama flag situation, I have written the Secretary of State and the chairman of the House Committee on Government Operations as per two which I shall now read:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 30, 1960.

Hon. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As shown by documentation in my address to the House on June 23, 1960, copy enclosed, it is clear that subordinates in your Department are determined to engage in the treacherous act of raising the Panama flag over the Canal Zone contrary to specific provisions of an act of this Congress and in violation of our treaty rights.

On two subsequent occasions, I have warned the House of Representatives that promptly after Congress adjourns your Department plans to recommend to the President that Panama be allowed to fly its flag over the constitutionally acquired domain of the United States known as the Canal Zone. These assertions have not been denied.

Accordingly, in view of the failure of your Department to recognize our Nation's legal position, I am writing you to give notice that should a formal display of the Panama flag over the Canal Zone be made with the knowledge of your Department, Members of the House, who are clothed with constitutional authority in this regard, will press for your impeachment.

The Congress is representative of the sovereignty of the people under our Constitution and the members of your Department are their employees.

With assurances of my highest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DANIEL J. FLOOD,
Member of Congress.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 30, 1960.

Hon. WILLIAM L. DAWSON,
Chairman, Committee on Government Operations, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The determination of subordinate elements in the Department of State to authorize a formal display of the Panama flag over the constitutionally acquired territory of the United States known as the Canal Zone has been announced and commented upon on the floor of the House without denial from that Department.

Because wresting control of the Panama Canal from the United States is a prime Communist objective for the takeover of the Caribbean area and for discrediting the United States in the eyes of the world, any such position is evidence of subversive influences in the Department of State, because it is in disregard of authority conferred upon that Department in administering our treaty obligations.

Enclosed herewith is a copy of my address to the House on June 23, 1960, and a copy of my letter of June 30, 1960, to the Secretary of State.

Because of the seriousness of the situation at Panama, I urge you as chairman of the Committee on Government Operations to start an immediate investigation of the Department of State to identify the persons responsible for what, in effect, has been a treasonable influence on the conduct of our isthmian policies.

Sincerely yours,

DANIEL J. FLOOD,
Member of Congress.

COMMUNISM AND THE CARIBBEAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in many previous addresses to the House, I have endeavored to describe the worsening situation in the Caribbean, now well on its way toward being transformed into a Red lake or, indeed the American "Soviet Sea," and to emphasize the necessity for action by the Congress in the form of positive declarations to defend our policies against Bolshevist attack.

In this effort, I have not been alone. The seriousness of the mounting crisis to the south of us was ably described on May 20, 1960 before the Long Island Federation of Women's Clubs by the Honorable Spruille Braden of New York.

A distinguished diplomat, who has served as the U.S. Ambassador to Colombia, 1939–42, Ambassador to Cuba, 1942–45, and as Assistant Secretary of State for American Republic Affairs, 1945–47, Dr. Braden has had a unique opportunity to observe at first hand the countries bordering on the Caribbean. Thus his views represent digested knowledge derived from experience as well as study. They add materially to the arguments set forth in my address on June 12, 1960, over the Manion Forum Network entitled "U.S. Faltering in Caribbean Invites Disaster," which was reprinted in remarks of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 23, 1960.

To make Dr. Braden's illuminating address available to the Nation at large in the permanent annals of the Congress, I quote the text, which is commended for study to all concerned with hemispheric security:

COMMUNISM AND THE CARIBBEAN

(Address by The Honorable Spruille Braden before Long Island Federation of Women's Clubs, May 20, 1960)

Always it is a pleasure to speak before the Long Island Federation of Women's Clubs, made up as it is, of so distinguished and attractive a group of ladies. I am especially complimented by your kind invitation to address you a second time. Also, it is a rewarding experience, because as I learned last year, individually and collectively, you make your views known in Washington, and they are listened to with attention and respect.

Therefore, to the extent you agree with my theses today, I hope you may be disposed to bring such constructive influences to bear on the administration and Congress, as may compel legislation and measures to wipe out at least some of the dangers now threatening the United States.

Let me begin by saying that I am profoundly worried by the way things are going all over the world. I am alarmed by the growth of collectivism on all sides, and the infiltration of communism into every phase of our national existence.

I used to say that probably I could live out my life in relative tranquillity, but that I was sorry for my children, and much sorrier for my grandchildren. Presently, I am not so sure that major catastrophe may not strike our Nation, even before the relatively few years remaining to me shall have run their course.

The United States, provenly the greatest and finest country ever to rise on the face of the globe, is in mortal peril of being struck down, not by an enemy from without, but by apathy and ignorance, collectivism and treason from within, opening the way for socialism and communism. This is a repugnant, not to say intolerable, thought, yet it is precisely what may happen unless the American public is awakened soon—very soon—to the danger; and through our republican processes, so impresses its views on Congress and the administration, as to force them to immediate and effective steps for the preservation of the Republic and of our way of life.

This morning, it is my purpose to speak with you about one of the many threats to our security and, for that matter, to the safety of the entire Western Hemisphere. I refer to the spread of communism throughout the Caribbean beginning at the gateways from the Atlantic, passing Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, to the portals of the Panama Canal, and up to the soft underbelly of the United States itself.

When discussing communism, it is well to remind ourselves of the true nature of the beast. Therefore, with your permission, I shall list on the one hand, some of the many falsehoods and mistaken views, and on the other, some of the basic truths on this subject:

A. We are not confronted, as so many people think, merely by an antagonistic ideology, or solely by a group of evil men who never in the slightest will be influenced by appeals to reason, decency and morality, as we know these terms. This is a battle between light and darkness, right and wrong, freedom and slavery, religion and atheism. Communism is not peculiar to Russia, China, or any other country. Transcending all frontiers, it is a diabolical worldwide conspiracy, fanatically dedicated to the destruction of faith, of all national existence, individual dignity, and freedom everywhere. In particular, it aims to smash the United States and everything in which this Nation believes. The Communist leaders know that this must be done if they are to dominate and enslave humanity, as is their intention. They will stop at no crime or abomination to achieve their purposes. Testifying to this fact are the tens of millions cruelly tortured and murdered in the U.S.S.R., China, and the satellite countries, now, alas, including Cuba, only 90 miles from our shores.

B. More inhuman than even the Nazis at their worst, the Communists respect and fear only one thing: force—usually physical force—greater than their own. When they have the upper hand, they are unappeasable and relentless; they rant and rage, as do Khrushchev, Mao Tse-Tung and Fidel Castro. But when their bluffs are called by someone with superior power and determination, they plead, they beg, they even grovel, for accommodation, for peaceful coexistence, and pity. This is the experience of all of us who have had the opportunity to deal firmly with them.

C. Like the Nazis, they frequently are fiendishly clever; but similarly, they are not supermen. Both because of and despite their being such adept liars, one should doubt their every word; for my part I even believe false some of their claims about space navigation, including Lunik I and other alleged scientific achievements.

It was easy to identify the Nazis with their race superiority complexes, whereas the Communists shrewdly use the nationals in each country. They hide within other political parties, and are hard to detect or expose. They use well-intentioned idealists, dogooders, and other gullible citizens of each country as dupes to propagate their atheistic and materialistic ideology, and their satanic conspiracy. That is happening throughout the United States of America and the other 20 American republics and Canada.

D. The so-called card-carrying Communists are the shock troops used for cannon fodder in riots, insurrections, and revolutions. But they do not command. The really dangerous Communists—the Rosenbergs, the Klaus Fuchs and Hisses, and still more, their bosses—probably never had a card.

I testified before a Senate Committee in 1954, as to how Alger Hiss blatantly followed the Red line, in an attempt to arouse Panamanian animosity against the United States, and to support Soviet charges of aggression against the United States in the 1946 U.N. Assembly. But so securely was Hiss tucked away in an important State Department post, that at the time, I only thought he had blundered stupidly. I was not so sharp as I might have been, because I failed to recognize until afterward the Communist inspiration and impulse behind his actions.

E. The Communists always are a minority—a small one, even in Russia. Their leaders all over the world for the most part are drawn from the intellectual and bourgeois classes, rarely from the workers. The masses do not go "on the march" of their own volition. They are instigated and led by these cynical, envious and often frustrated intellectuals, ravenous for personal power. I have met, or been reliably informed about scores of Communists throughout this hemisphere; but I almost could count on the fingers of my hands those who originally were horny-handed sons of toil.

F. It is not true that the best or the only breeding ground for communism is where there are poverty and illiteracy. On the contrary, it usually flourishes most where there is industrialization and higher living conditions. To mention only two of many possible examples, witness northern Italy and our own great metropolitan areas, as contrasted with the lack of communism in the poor and unschooled regions of southern Italy or the Tennessee hills. Even in Russia and China, it was not until after the Communists had seized the large urban centers, such as Moscow and Shanghai, that they were able to conquer and make serfs of the great rural populations; at that, they had to resort to the mass murder of tens of millions of farmers. A similar procedure, on a numerically smaller scale, because there are fewer people to kill, is now underway in Cuba.

Poverty and illiteracy must be eradicated and replaced by improved living conditions and education, not by helter-skelter welfare statism, but only with the utmost care and thought exercised over a considerable period of time—perhaps generations.

G. Instead of meeting these problems intelligently, we have neglected our own needs, including the curing of poverty and illiteracy at home, in order, since 1946, to dash all over the earth, spending $80 billion on what we call foreign aid, or mutual security. Thereby, we neither have defeated communism, nor materially improved the lot of the recipient peoples anywhere. We have set an appallingly bad example of extravagance, waste and corruption, which always are inherent in such a huge bureaucratic operation. As a result, country after country has been pushed toward socialization, an accompanying inflation, and eventual ruin, thus easing the way for a subsequent Communist takeover and destroying the peoples' ambitions for a genuinely representative and constitutional government.

Bolivia offers a fair pattern of the harm we have done. By pouring in close to $200 million to sustain a Marxist regime, we have abetted murder and torture. Thousands of citizens have had to flee for their lives. The government has confiscated not only Bolivian-owned properties, but also those of U.S. citizens. Washington, in turn, taxes the latter in order to support and keep in office the self-same Communists and crooks, who seized the properties.

The squandering of much of these $80 billion on foreign aid destroys the value of our currency through inflation. It brings us closer to that national bankruptcy which Lenin sought, as a way to destroy our free Republic. Karl Marx, hoping to disrupt all constitutional government said: "The surest way to overturn the social order is to debauch the currency." In keeping with these precepts, both Lenin and Stalin declared that an essential for the spreading of communism was a program to aid underdeveloped areas. By our oversea giveaway system, we, like guileless innocents, have underwritten Communist plans for our own ruin. The Kremlin despots must roar with laughter at our naivete, as they promise to bury us.

H. Communists, to gain temporary benefits, will pact with anyone; with reactionary dictators, nationalists, or sworn anti-Communists. They both try to create new conflicts and to deepen those already existing. They gladly will reverse themselves, sacrifice and kill off their own agents, and always will go back two steps, in order later to take three forward.

Playing both ends against the middle, Communists often pretend to have intraparty disputes, one group supporting and the other opposing a particular government. This happened for a time vis-a-vis Peron in Argentina. However, they also have genuine and desperate schisms, such as arose between the Stalinists and Trotskyites. Such a cleavage may be starting now in Cuba between the older and younger generations of Communists. In this connection, I am not convinced so far of the sincerity of the so-called Movimiento de Recuperacion Revolucionario (the Movement to Recapture the Revolution). It might be a disguised group of Communists who, in an emergency, could be substituted for the Castro gang.

Since they grabbed Russia in 1917, the Communists have shown an almost unbelievable persistence; or, as my friend Bob Welch, of the John Birch Society, puts it, "A patient gradualism has been the most important key to the Communists' overwhelming success."

That has been their history in this hemisphere. After dismally failing to stir insurrection in Chile during late 1931, they attempted to seize power through a bloody revolution in El Salvador during 1932. Twenty thousand people lost their lives, and the Communists were defeated. Please remember that only a few Communists, by murder and terror, can and have seized many countries. They have persisted in their attempts to communize the Americas. Within the past year, Argentina, Mexico, and Uruguay have had to eject Soviet and satellite diplomats caught redhanded in subversion and espionage. During the last decade, Communist endeavors have been especially notable in Guatemala, Bolivia, and now, Cuba. It is by these patient, slow, and periodic, persevering, and insidious infiltrations that they expect eventually to demoralize, envelop, and then take over the United States of America. They have traveled far along this road.

I. When the Communists wish to seize control of a country, they try at an early stage, if possible, to wipe out the Army, especially the Officer Corps. Certainly the assassination of at least 10,000 Polish officers in the Katyn Forest, largely contributed toward that poor nation's fall. The same procedure was followed successfully in China and other satellite countries. That the armed forces, especially the officers, were not eradicated in Spain, Guatemala, the Dominion Republic, Argentina, and Venezuela, so far has saved these republics. But this well-known Communist tactic did prevail in Bolivia and Cuba, with dire results for those poor people.

J. It is foolish, as our inter-American conferences have done, to underscore international communism as the only danger. Any brand of Marxism, international, or national, of which there are a wide variety in this hemisphere, is bad: Socialism, the "Flop of the Century", as it has been characterized by Max Eastman, himself a former Socialist, is merely a prep school for communism.

It is pertinent to observe that so inefficient is socialism, that it only can be made to work at all when propelled and protected by the authority and ruthlessness of a totalitarian police state, such as the U.S.S.R. If it were not for this, the Soviet and every other Communist government, long since would have gone down the drain.

The United States of America cannot beat communism, coupled with Soviet-Sino aggression and imperialism, if we ourselves sink into the ineptitude, impotence, and waste of collectivism, welfare statism, or that impalpable thing called "social democracy". There are only two ways by which we can win:

1. By ourselves becoming the biggest and strongest totalitarian police state, with the consequent abandonment of all morality, liberty, and everything else we hold dear, or;

2. By forthwith throwing out, bag, and baggage, the socialism which, as Norman Thomas boasts, has taken over our country, and by returning to the principles laid down by the Founding Fathers. If we will again become the constitutional representative republic which we are supposed to be; if we wholeheartedly will support free, private, competitive enterprise, then we will not only survive, but we can and will outproduce, outsell, and handily defeat any combination of socialist states, totalitarian, or otherwise, who dare to defy us.

Because of the relative underdevelopment, plus the large admixture of Indian (of Asiatic origin) and other non-Caucasian blood in much of Central and South America, the Communists long ago felt that Chinese methods of infiltration and guerrilla warfare would be best suited south of the Rio Grande. In the early twenties, promising young Communists from Latin America were trained in the "Yenan Way" by Mao Tse-tung, Chu Teh, Li Li Siang, and their colleagues, in the outskirts of Moscow. Now, with certain exceptions, such as the sabotage school in Prague, the Chinese are becoming increasingly active in the subversion of this hemisphere. They inspire more confidence amongst intellectuals and students—even in the secondary schools—than do the Russians. Also, the Chinese brand of communism has been more readily accepted than the Muscovite. Unfortunately, the Cuban Government now is spreading its Red agents over the entire hemisphere; they are financed lavishly and are proving far more effective than those of any other nationality, including the Chinese. They go in the garb of diplomats, cultural, trade or labor delegations, or as simple tourists.

Castro and the Cuban Communists frankly proclaim their intentions to rule the Western Hemisphere, just as Messrs. Lenin, Stalin, and Khrushchev, like Hitler and Mussolini, called their shots in advance. In 1924, Lenin in summary prophesied: "We shall take Eastern Europe; next the mass of Asia; then we can encircle that last bastion of capitalism, the United States of America. We shall not have to take it; it will fall like overripe fruit into our hands. (sic) The Cuban Communists expect to be the hands.

Eastern Europe and most of Asia are gone. A part of the Middle East is lost, and the rest is wobbling. Western Europe trembles, and Africa is teetering.

The Communist Party claimed a worldwide membership of 4 million in 1937. Twenty years later, this had grown to 33 million—up over 800 percent. But far more serious than this increase in party membership, is the fact that since August 1945, the Communists have averaged the enslavement of over 7,000 people per hour. At least 1,000 million people, non- and anti-Communists, who 15 years ago were as free as you and I, now live in virtual slavery, behind Iron, Bamboo, and more recently, Sugar Curtains.

Washington for years, in an attempt to counter this grim offensive, has squandered the $80 billion I mentioned, and has placed our troops and bases all over the world. It has entered into NATO, SEATO, and other similar alliances. We citizens have had dinned in upon us that the Rhine and Berlin, Korea and Taiwan, and many other far-off spots are our real frontiers, and vital for the defense of the United States of America.

Yet, no administration since 1948 has given more than a passing thought, or done anything effective to protect our shores and this hemisphere from the very serious threats which have been growing up throughout the Caribbean area.

Repeatedly, from 1942 to 1947 I, officially by cable, dispatch and in person, warned the highest officers of our Government about the Communist danger in Cuba and Latin America, including the Peron regime in Argentina. Later I sounded the alarm about Guatemala. But on October 4, 1957, I went out of my way to tell the State Department that a continuation of its policies inevitably would bring Castro, chaos, and communism to Cuba. My warnings were ignored.

By use of the most dangerous of all Communist weapons, infiltration and subversion, beginning in 1947, power gradually was seized in the Republic of Guatemala by Presidents Arevalo and Arbenz, together with their Communist coconspirators. Fortunately, in 1954, the Communist regime was overthrown. The United States was blamed throughout Latin America for an intervention we had lacked the brains and initiative to carry through in our own defense.

What actually happened was that the President of Nicaragua, Tacho Somoza, had the courage, through his Ambassador in Washington, to buy planes and equipment for the Guatemalan Colonel Castillo Armas, who chased the Communists out of his homeland. The State Department did nothing, until a group of ambassadors from the other American Republics in effect said, "You are being blamed for intervention in Guatemala. It doesn't matter what the truth is. You will be considered the culprits and accused of intervention. Therefore, you might as well help out, and quickly, because if you don't, Castillo Armas will lose, Arbenz will win, and then you will find a series of these little Communist dictators cropping up all over Central America."

Only then did we support Castillo Armas. Of course, there is the unfortunate sequel that both he and Tacho Somoza were assassinated, and there is good reason to believe that the Communists had a hand in that.

One glance around the Caribbean shows it is fast becoming a Red lake. The Communist, Jeddy Jegan, is top man in British Guiana. The French islands, such as Martinique, are represented in the Paris Parliament by Communists. Betancourt's government in Venezuela, while admittedly left-wing, nevertheless might be upset by the Communists any time. Panama is weak, and the "comrades" are infiltrating there, as they are trying to do again in Guatemala. Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic are under severe attacks. Trinidad demands that we get out of our military base at Chaguamaras.

Of all the Caribbean republics, by instinct and experience the least influenced by exotic totalitarianism has been Colombia. Yet, since 1948, it has suffered continuously from Communist inspired and directed guerrilla bands operating in outlying districts. As a result in these areas, the national economy has been disrupted, agriculture paralyzed, thus raising the cost of living. The terrorized peasants have had to seek refuge in the cities where they can find no work. The ensuing chaos has broken down law and order and eased the way for communism. This plan of the comrades has been executed slyly and effectively under the leadership of such Communists as Gerardo Molina and Jorge Salamea.

Because Cuba is the most dangerous spot in the Caribbean, I shall devote the rest of what I say today to the catastrophe which now engulfs that beautiful island and wonderful people.

Parenthetically I should add that having been accredited as Ambassador to Batista during his first term of office as President, I am intimately acquainted with all of his bad as well as his good points. I also am fully informed of the many atrocities perpetrated during the closing years of his last administration. During that period, the Batista government could be compared to a serious and painful ulcer. In contrast, under the present Communist regime, Cuba is suffering from a cancer which, with indescribable agony, will kill.

If, by the grace of God, the Cuban Communist regime could be purged tomorrow, the effects of the economic and social, moral and spiritual evils it has wrought will endure for a very long time. This is part of a "burnt earth" policy always pursued by the Communists. If they cannot rule, they try to ruin.

Even at this late date, when the Communist nature of the Castro revolution should be apparent to a child, authorities in Washington profess to be puzzled by the Cuban situation [sic]. They cannot understand Castro's motives, and even declare that no one can assert that a Communist regime rules that unhappy island [sic].

Well, I do categorically and emphatically assert that Castro, his brother Raul, "Che" Guevarra, President Dorticós, and practically every other important official is a Communist, and that Cuba rapidly is coming just as much under Communist domination as the U.S.S.R., China, and any of the satellites or Yugoslavia, I further assert that this constitutes a grave threat to the United States, to our security, and that positive remedial measures must be taken immediately.

To substantiate my aforegiven assertions, let me briefly review the record for you: I learned quite a lot about Communists, their ways and foibles, while serving as Ambassador in Cuba from 1942 to 1945, because all their activities throughout this hemisphere were directed from Havana by a man named Fabio Grobart—probably a Pole. The only exception was that propaganda among colored people, in and around the Caribbean, was run from Harlem. Grobart traveled under 11 aliases and 9 different passports. He was an extremely important man. He set up and ran the "Caribbean Bureau," which was a section or branch of the Cominform. Castro's so-called 26th of July movement (i.e., his revolutionary movement), is a direct outgrowth and descendant of the Caribbean Bureau, including much of the same membership.

I was fortunate enough in Cuba to destroy a Communist organization known as the National Anti-Fascist Front. My action in this particular caused a bit of rumpus with the Soviet diplomatic representative in Havana. It was then that I learned how a Communist will grovel and demean himself, when faced with superior force.

Some of the then well-known Communists, such as President Dorticós, Minister of State (Foreign Minister) Raul Roa, the two heads of INRA (the Agrarian Reform Institute) and many others, now, as a temporary expedient, pretend, just as Mao Tse-tung once did, not to be Communists, but simply agrarian reformers, seeking only the welfare of the masses. As members of the 26th of July movement, they are every bit as Communist as are Khrushchev and his Kremlin pals.

Also, while I was Ambassador in Havana, the notorious Harry Dexter White, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, tried to put over an insidious and clever scheme to establish a Central Bank and Cuban currency on such conditions as inevitably would have brought about so severe a financial and economic chaos as to open the way for the Communists. Again I was lucky enough to defeat those machinations and to learn some more about their worldwide conspiracy.

You will observe that our "great and noble Russian ally," even in the midst of World War II, by patient gradualism, was trying to get a footing at our very threshold, just as it had been trying to do for more than 30 years previously. Nor is there anything new about Communist endeavors to take over Cuba.

As for Fidel Castro, in the university he was recognized as a Communist by such a distinguished professor as Carlos Marquez Sterling and by fellow students including his own former brother-in-law. He had a rival candidate for the presidency of the student organization assassinated. Even his stanchest advocate in the United States, Herbert Matthews of the New York Times, admits that Fidel, during the 1940's, belonged to a young Communist group, and that he actively participated in the Communist-inspired and directed Bogotazo, which almost destroyed by fire the capital city of Colombia during the Inter-American Conference of 1948. The Bogota's police records are more precise and prove that Castro was a Communist, sent by his party to help bring on that disaster.

Castro trained for guerrilla warfare in Mexico, under the Spanish Communist Colonel, now General, Bayo. When the Castro boys and their followers attacked the Moncada barracks near Santiago in 1953 before being repulsed and captured, they killed, in typically Communist style, with their machetes and knives a dozen or so of the soldiers, who were sick in their hospital beds.

The brothers, while still revolutionaries in the eastern Cuban hills, reportedly received substantial arms and financial aid from the Soviet. During that period they gave another example of usual Communist tactics, when they kidnaped a number of United States and Canadian civilians, plus a score of Marines, from our Guantanamo Naval Base. That the U.S. Government not only tolerated this indignity, but sent first one, and then two of its consular officers to the hills, to negotiate with these bandits, is one of the most disgraceful episodes in our history. Our acceptance of this outrage of course encouraged the Cuban Communists to further violence and insults. I might add that some of the scurrilities launched against the United States and President Eisenhower by Castro and his companions via the Havana press, radio, and television are unrepeatable in any polite company.

Fidel described his attack on the Moncada Barracks as the springboard from which he would take Cuba. And later, after Batista fled, he said Cuba would be the springboard from which he would take the hemisphere. In short, he hopes to be the Mao Tse-tung of the Americas, and spearhead of what he calls the continental revolution.

But enough of the psychopath Fidel, and his brother Raul, who with his wife, were trained behind the Iron Curtain. Already too much attention has been given to the Castros, who at the most, are only important incidents in this whole affair. If Fidel continues to lose his influence over the masses and becomes expendable, he will be wiped out overnight, just as have been Beria and so many other top Communists in the Soviet, Czechoslovakia, and elsewhere. But the Communists will remain in power. Having assassinated him they might even blame the "imperialistic Yankees" and acclaim Fidel as a "martyr."

Not only is the present Cuban Government largely manned by Communists, but everything it has done shows its true Red color and is in keeping with the normal, cruel procedures recommended by the supreme Soviet:

(a) One of the first things it did after getting power was—in cold blood, with Communist-incited popular clamor replacing any pretense of justice or a fair trial—to shoot soldiers and police, mostly officers, and even some civilians. The Castro government admits to something over 600 being murdered in this bloodthirsty fashion. Other estimates range from 5,000 or 6,000 to as high as 15,000.

(b) Many thousands more—probably upward of 30,000 Cuban citizens—have been imprisoned under the most shocking conditions of suffering, misery, and torture.

Political prisoners, no more guilty of criminal or counterrevolutionary activities than are you ladies, are subjected to indescribably wicked and cruel tortures.

Ernesto de la Fe, a well-known anti-Communist leader who opposed Batista, and whose forehead was severely cut by a jailer's gun lashing, is imprisoned on the Isle of Pines. He and many others are forced to work all day under the broiling tropical sun, but allowed only the equivalent of a small paper cup of water per day. Their insufficient food is mixed with offal and filth. The prisoners' cells and clothing are infested with vermin. Bayonets are run into the orifices of the body. Or the guards, getting bored, play such games as awakening a prisoner in the middle of the night, telling him his hour has come, marching him off, lining up the firing squad and shooting—but with blanks. What fun, what a sense of humor.

(c) The regular army and officer corps having been killed, imprisoned, or otherwise disposed of, the usual Communist-led peasants', workers', women's, and children's—even 7 to 10 years old—militias have been and are being established, just as has been done in China, Bolivia, and so many other Communist-controlled countries. This is just one more step toward totalitarian regimentation. Including these militias, Castro is mobilizing the largest army in Latin America, to total 135,000 men and women. His May 1, 1960, parade, with tanks, weapons, soldiers, and militia, imitated the Moscow show on a smaller but none-the-less impressive scale.

(d) With the sole exception of the Communists, every other political party has been wiped out. Castro has just proclaimed that he will not indulge the people in what he calls the "antidemocratic farce of elections."

(e) Systematically, private property is being confiscated without any compensation whatsoever, or even a receipt being given. The promise of payment in 4-percent, 30-year bonds has been broken. Up here, we have read of how approaching $1 billion worth of U.S. property has been or is being taken over, or as they call it, "intervened," which is the same thing. To this should be added the huge confiscations of Cuban holdings from thousands of small businessmen and humble folk of very modest means.

The government either has seized, or gradually is acquiring, at least a 51-percent control over all industry and commerce, banking and business. On April 25, the "Bank of Foreign Commerce" was created to be the "sole importer and exporter" of products as "may be to the national interest."

(f) The entire public is subjected to intensive around-the-clock propaganda, all with a furious pro-Communist and anti-United States content.

This mind conditioning of the Cuban people is good Communist practice. It is designed to prepare the ground for subsequent action.

Everyone, every Nation, likes to feel they have friends, even protectors, who will stand by in times of stress. In Latin America, especially Cuba, that always has been the role of the United States of America. By their hate, hate, hate the United States of America program, the Communists hope to replace us with the U.S.S.R. in Cuban minds and hearts.

Parenthetically, this explains Cuba's renewal of diplomatic relations with the Kremlin, the trade agreement with Mikoyan, and the delivery to Havana, in Soviet tankers of oil and gasoline, which Cuba could buy far more cheaply from her neighbor, Venezuela.

(g) Education similarly is being converted to the Communist and "hate Yankee" lines. These themes are driven home in the press and over television and the radio, so that even the small children of respectable anti-Communist citizens recite them by rote. Brainwashing is at a peak which is not even exceeded in Russia, China, or any of the satellite countries.

English is no longer taught in the schools, and the history books have been altered to paint the United States as a tyrannical enemy, who for reasons of selfish gain, delayed the final victory in the Spanish-American War, thus sacrificing thousands of Cuban lives.

In all of this there is the additional tragic note that never were any people more warmly friendly to our country, than the Cubans of all classes.

(h) The Cuban 1940 constitution has been violated in practically every clause by the words and actions of this Communist regime. No longer is there any separation of powers, review of government acts by the courts, nor equality and equity under the law. The judges are told what to do and how to rule or pass judgment. When a judge failed to condemn some aviators, pursuant to Castro's orders, he was shot for his pains. As in this case, the unconstitutional death penalty has been employed ruthlessly and repeatedly, as I have already described. Life, and the security of either person or property under law no longer exist in Cuba.

(i) Fundamental and human civil rights and freedoms are ignored completely.

(j) There is no real liberty of expression and opinion, nor of assembly.

(k) Everyone, including children, is encouraged to denounce members of their families, friends, and neighbors for "counter-revolutionary" activity, which can be made to cover almost anything, such as not attending a Castro meeting. But the prime "counter-revolutionary" crime for which loss of property, arrest and even the death penalty may be imposed, is the slightest sign of anti-communism, or even non-communism. Marinello, the head of the Communist Party, Foreign Minister Roa, and Castro all have declared that any attack on communism is an attack on Cuba (sic).

l. Armed aggressions have been planned and perpetrated against Panama, Haiti, Nicaragua, Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, and even Paraguay, 5,000 miles to the south.

The attack last year on Panama evidently was aimed at the Madden Dam.

The Cuban regime actively has pulled diplomatic wires to encourage Panama and Nasser to get together in order to force the United States of America out of the Canal Zone.

(m) Known criminals are given favors and preferences over political prisoners, and encouraged to beat them up. Sometimes, as a reward, criminals are freed to be given government jobs.

A notorious criminal escaped from the United States of America has been naturalized and is a major in the army. His special delight is sadistically to shoot the finishing bullet into the prisoners' heads as they lie wounded by the firing squad.

(n) Decrees and so-called penal laws are applied retroactively or ex post facto.

(o) No one, without special government permission, can take out of the country more than $150, in any one year. Far worse than this, those men and women who are permitted to leave, often are stripped and searched in the most intimate and embarrassing fashion. Others can only get out of Cuba by escaping, just as do those fleeing from behind the Iron Curtain.

(p) Very few of the guajiros (peasants) have received the farmlands promised them under the so-called agrarian reform. Those who have, must work their farms under rigid official controls and can neither sell nor leave them to their heirs. Also, they easily can lose them at the whim of any minor government supervisor.

(q) Most of the confiscated lands and other properties have been converted into cooperatives owned and operated by the state. The workers, as in Russia, often receive smaller wages than before, and in all cases, are loaded down with new taxes, such as 4 percent for the government's purchase of arms. As a result, their take-home pay is considerably less than before, and in a 40-percent to 50-percent devalued peso, As labor increasingly comes under the subjugation of the Communists, who now control the unions, it will sink into serfdom.

(r) Almost the first thing the Communists did on seizing power was to burn the files of the official anti-Communist Bureau known as BRAC.

The No. 2 man in that organization, Captain Castano, was a brilliant and highly competent young officer, who had been trained in the United States by CIA. He was completely nonpolitical. Nevertheless, within a few weeks after the revolution, he was shot summarily. It is reported that our Embassy requested and was granted clemency for him.

(s) The most important inter-American multilateral treaties have been repudiated publicly by Fidel Castro, because his Government did not sign them (sic). It should be noted that the Caracas Charter, which he denounced, pledged all of the American republics to oppose and fight international communism.

(t) An unsuccessful attempt was made by Castro to subvert some Cuban priests to separate from Rome and form a Cuban Church. His proposition was rejected indignantly; he now attacks the Church whenever opportunity presents.

(u) The official Government radio repeatedly has attempted to arouse Puerto Rican animosities against the United States, and even to encourage a Negro uprising in our Southern States. Cuban Communist agents actively are proselyting in the factories of Miami and elsewhere in Florida.

The Cuban regime, having denounced all of the great press associations, such as AP and UPI, as the instruments of Yankee imperialism, has established its own Prensa Latina, which in reality is merely a branch of the Soviet information agency.

(v) As I have indicated, the Castro revolution, from its inception, has received every possible backing from international communism. Now, Cuba has been pledged a worldwide trade union boycott of all U.S. products, and a blockade of our ships, should we dare to enact any economic or other reprisal for the theft of property owned by our citizens. This proposal originated with the Mexican non-card-carrying Communist, Vincente Lombardo Toledano.

(w) Russian, Czech, and other foreign Communist agents have been supplied with Cuban passports to facilitate their travels throughout this hemisphere.

(x) The Cuban Foreign Office has been trying desperately to convene a conference of so-called underdeveloped countries. Those so far invited are largely the Communist or "neutralist" nations of Asia, the Middle East and Africa. The more responsible Latin American countries, such as Argentina and Chile, have refused to have anything to do with this proposition.

The intent of this conference clearly is to disrupt international relations, viciously attack the United States, and to demand at least $30 billion from us for development in Latin America.

On April 5, 1960, the World Conference of Young Communists convened in Havana. Four thousand attended, with all expenses paid by Cuba. Speakers from every country vied with one another in damning and insulting the United States and its people.

(y) Great numbers of Russian, Chinese and other technicians have come to Cuba during the last year. On May 1, the international Marxist Day, Castro was accompanied on the reviewing stand by the representatives of the Soviet, Red China, Czechoslovakia, and other Communist countries.

There is even some reason to believe that the very secret work known to be going on in the Zapata swamps, involves the construction of missile pads under the guidance of some of the Soviet technicians. There are reports that the U.S.S.R. also is installing a submarine base.

(z) Cuba's Communist Minister of Foreign Relations, Roa, was an inmitigated liar when he accused President Ydigoras of Guatemala and the United Fruit Co. of planning an attack on Cuba. This is good Communist procedure: always to accuse the opponent of what one is doing himself. In view of the timidity shown in Washington, it is pertinent to observe that Ydigoras promptly has broken diplomatic relations with Cuba.

The aforegiven listing of Communist activities by the Cuban Government from "a" to "z" could be extended manifold. But I will spare you the numerous other harrowing details.

I trust from what I have said that you will agree with me that:

1. Few people in this country or the hemisphere have any real comprehension of the true nature of the vast and complicated Communist conspiracy. They must be alerted and made to take positive and constructive steps for the safety of the United States and all the Americas.

2. The Communists' infiltrations and subversions have produced such fantastic results that they now control 40 percent of the world's population. Even this does not give the full picture because if we could count on all our allies, which I doubt, there still are left among the remaining 60 percent, many hundreds of millions of "neutralists," who even if they do not oppose or fight us, never will be of any help.

3. The situation is almost terrifying in its connotations for the security of the United States, especially now that Communism is advancing all around the Caribbean, with main objectives being Panama and Cuba, the latter of which now is completely in the enemy's hands. Of course, the ultimate target is the United States of America.

4. It is apparent that the State Department is utterly oblivious to this major threat looking to the final subjugation of the United States. It either has ignored or treated the situation with timidity and vacillation for years, thus making it all the more perilous. It has forgotten that never in history has appeasement paid and that if Cuban Communists get away with kicking us in the teeth, others soon will follow suit.

Anti-Communists throughout Latin America, because of our pusillanimous attitudes, are discouraged and do not dare force a bold and positive initiative against our common enemy;

5. In self-defense, it is our right, under the Organization of American States and the United Nations Charters, and infinitely more important, under God's law, that we should take immediate and forthright action to end this threat to our Nation and our very lives.

6. Any further delays in saving Cuba may be fatal for them and for us. Among the steps which still can be taken are:

Here at home, get rid of all the Communist agents and infiltrators along with their stooges.

Stop paying Cuba nearly double the world price of sugar, or a premium of about $150 million per year. True, the Cuban people might temporarily suffer, but they would benefit in the end by ridding themselves of their Communist masters. This measure should have been used over a year ago, when it would have been far more effective.

Stop all foreign aid to Communist nations, including Cuba, and eliminate all the extravagance, waste, and corruption involved in these foreign aid programs. In other words, we should put ourselves in fighting trim to resist the Communist infiltrations and subversions which now are right at our own front door.

Make amply clear to Khrushchev, Castro and Company, that we will no longer tolerate their insults, robbery of our citizens' properties, and economic or armed aggressions; and that if these things do not stop, we will break diplomatic relations. The mere threat of such action in Cuba, even at the late date, would weaken that Communist government greatly.

Give full support in every appropriate way, to a group of responsible Cubans, who with such aid, can and will free their country from the Communist tyrants, and return it to constitutional representative government.

It is these things to which I trust you ladies will give your support, thereby helping to force the Congress and administration in Washington to courageous and positive action.

God have mercy on our country.

DISTRESSED OR DEPRESSED AREAS BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, faced with the long and turbulent history of the area redevelopment bill, also known as the distressed or depressed areas bill, and also as the Flood-Douglas bill, I recognize the need for another approach to at least one part, but an important part, of this many sided problem.

The Chamber of Commerce, the Committee of One Hundred, and the Industrial Development Committee of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., and the Chamber of Commerce and the Can-Do Committee of Hazleton, Pa., are outstanding examples of what a community can do to help itself to meet the issues of unemployment, underemployment, and general economic and industrial development. With a long history of success in raising local funds in various ways and enjoying the enthusiastic participation of local banks in financing its extensive programs, these areas soon realized that its local risk capital was exhausted for this purpose and what was needed now is a bill to allow banks and lending institutions to rediscount their industrial mortgages with the Federal Government following generally the same pattern as Fannie Mae mortgages. These mortgages should be purchased at a little less interest rate than the banks have charged in order to give trustee banks an opportunity to charge a small sum for servicing the loans for the Federal Government. This proposal has been endorsed by bankers, lawyers, by various union people, and by the businessmen, and by the industrial development corporations of the affected area.

This type of program is an absolute "must" for communities who have attempted an economic renaissance. When the communities run out of financial "steam," additional moneys could thus be funneled into the community for industrial development usage at no cost to the Government. It would be a loan which would be repaid with interest. Another point in its favor is an existing Government agency could handle the entire transaction.

Secondly, the Federal Government should rediscount the third mortgages of industrial development agencies in the same manner. It would supply these communities with partial or additional funds to continue their industrial development program through their existing industrial development corporations.

Here is a concrete proposal which would continue to spark our industrial renaissance, so I have a suggested program of Federal loan guarantee and discount facility—the proposal outlined below is patterned generally after the V-loan program authorized by the Defense Production Act of 1950:

First. An independent agency, the Area Redevelopment Administration, would be established—similar to that provided for in S. 722. This Agency would determine the eligibility of areas under criteria established by the law.

Second. The ARA would be authorized to insure industrial loans in eligible areas if it determined that the loan would contribute to the basic economic health of the area and that it met certain standards of soundness. This guarantee would cover up to 90 percent of the outstanding balance of the loan and a premium would be charged by ARA. To initiate the program, the Treasury would be authorized to contribute $10 million as an insurance reserve. This Treasury contribution would be ultimately repayable from income received from application fees and insurance premiums.

Third. The ARA would discount the insured portion of any loan upon demand by the borrower. The amount of the discount would be based on the current cost of money to ARA. To finance these purchases, ARA would be authorized to issue its own debentures, not guaranteed by the Government, to private investors. To provide a basis for issuing these debentures, the Treasury would be authorized to purchase $10 million preferred stock in the ARA discount facility—to be repaid to the Treasury eventually out of income. In addition, the investor who sold a loan to ARA would be required to purchase a certain percent of capital stock.

The proposals made in the ARA plan are aimed primarily at those areas of substantial unemployment which are making progress in helping themselves. In particular, the purpose is to free funds of banks which are loaned up both in terms of their total ratio of industrial loans to deposits and in the amounts which can be loaned to a single borrower. It is also intended to help development corporations which have reached the limit of their financial capacity.

It has been proposed that the Federal Government provide guarantees of privately made loans and also a discount facility empowered to purchase loans from banks and development corporations. In addition to establishing precedents for this type of aid, the assistance proposed by this plan might be patterned after one of these programs. The plan generally follows the V-loan program.

It should be noted that the insurance and discount proposals could be considered independently. The principal benefit of the insurance feature would be to encourage private lending institutions outside the redevelopment areas to purchase loans from local lenders, thus freeing local resources. A Federal discount facility would not need the insurance although the insuring agency might well handle the review and approval of loans more expeditiously than the discounting agency.

It has been suggested that the Federal Housing Administration be the agency to write this insurance. However, this would probably antagonize the real estate interests which would object to seeing FHA take on a program outside their field. Also, the insuring of industrial loans would be completely new to the FHA staff. Already there are many complaints that FHA processing takes far too long—often as much as 45 days—to approve applications in their own field of housing. Also, it seems certain that other Government agencies, particularly the Department of Commerce, would raise strong objections on jurisdictional grounds.

LOAN INSURANCE

Obviously, it is very important to keep redtape and bureaucratic details to a minimum. A coinsurance approach such as is used in the FHA property improvement program would help to hold processing time to a minimum. For example, the Government might guarantee 90 percent of the outstanding balance of a loan.

A FEDERAL DISCOUNT FACILITY

In view of objections to using Federal money for area redevelopment any discount facility would probably have to be patterned after the Federal National Mortgage Association's secondary market operations.

Briefly, FNMA is authorized to sell its own debentures—which do not carry any Federal guarantee—to private investors in an amount up to 10 times its capital, surplus, reserves, and undistributed earnings. The initial capital was provided by the Treasury which purchased $50 million of FNMA preferred stock. Additional capital comes from the requirement that anyone selling a mortgage to FNMA must purchase common stock equal to 2 percent of the amount of mortgages sold. The objections to a similar discount facility for area redevelopment would be the initial Treasury capital required plus the fact that the debentures which the agency sold would compete with the Treasury for private funds.

THE V-LOAN PROGRAM

An interesting variation of the insurance-discount idea was provided in the Defense Production Act of 1950. Under this program, Government procurement agencies, primarily the Department of Defense, were authorized to guarantee loans when necessary to stimulate defense production. This guarantee included a provision that upon request by the lender the procuring agency was required to buy the loan. Adapting this to area redevelopment, the law might authorize an Area Redevelopment Administration to offer its guarantee for any loan which it determined would aid employment in an eligible community. This guarantee would also contain a contractual agreement that the agency would purchase the loan upon request by the lender. The funds for these purchases could be obtained from the sale in the private market of the agency's own debentures.

COMMUNITY FACILITIES

In regard to points 3 and 4 of the outline hereinabove, which call for long-term low-interest loans to private utilities for highways and schools and other services to industrial tracts, it is suggested that the funds be made available by earmarking authorizations in existing programs such as the public facilities loan program administered by Community Facilities Administration—HHFA. These earmarked funds could be used only after certification of need by the Area Redevelopment Agency.

As a result of the developments which was witnessed in my own area, such greatest need is refinancing assistance. The problem existing in our industrial development agencies here is that we have reached the limits of the lending capacity of most of the banks. We have already been forced to secure out-of-area financing in one instance. We are rapidly being forced out of this area for financing in many other instances.

Under these circumstances, it seems that one important thing that we should try to do is to establish a system whereby the banks in an area could rediscount the "paper" with the Federal Government. As I have said, this would be much along the lines of the so-called Fannie Mae mortgages whereby the Government buys up or rediscounts these mortgages.

If this could be arranged for the labor-surplus areas utilizing industrial development programs, it would mean loaned-to-capacity banks could rediscount this paper with the Federal Government, possibly at a percentage slightly less than what they are receiving. This difference could be used to pay the banks for the servicing of the Federal Government's mortgage and handling the collection.

This, of course, must be done in such a way that the Federal Government would be the lender rather than the banks. This is necessary so that the local development corporation would no longer be liable to the banks and would no longer be carried by the banks as an up-to-capacity borrower. Thus, the banks would have a practically inexhaustible lending capacity to an industrial development organization such as Can-Do in Hazleton or any similar local group.

The second feature of this bill should be that Can-Do, the local group, would be able to either mortgage its interest to the Federal Government at a nominal rate of interest, which should be less, of course, than what Can-Do is paying to its bondholders and a sufficient percentage of interest left so that Can-Do can service the collections and pay for them out of the interest. Can-Do could either mortgage any interest that it had left in any particular building or, as in the case of some buildings where it had taken mortgages, could rediscount these mortgages with the Federal Government. If this system were set up, it would mean an end to any further Can-Do drives for money since it would have a continual revolving fund of money until such time as all Can-Do bonds were due for redemption. Every time it had reached the limit of its capacity and were completely out of money, it could then either mortgage any interest it still had with the Federal Government, or it could rediscount with the Federal Government any mortgage that it would then hold. As I see it, this is one great need of such local groups.

Another thing, it will urge any area that wants any Government assistance to first go out and raise funds of their own—this should be a qualification of the bill—and will urge States that want assistance to set up funds of their own before they would have any ability to rediscount in the method that I have set forth. The financing plans suggested here will provide the large majority of the necessary industrial development money once a community has raised funds. While the Federal Government would be participating with its ability to raise and loan money, it would not require the Federal Government to participate unless the community and State had first shown initiative. This would have a great advantage in that it would proceed to construct buildings in exactly the same manner it is doing now. Thus, it would only be when it would reach a limit of its funds that we would apply for this assistance. Federal redtape would not prevent a delay in the construction of the building or the signing of a prospect.

I respectfully submit that regardless of what is done about any other type of bill, we should go on record as urging this kind of assistance.

I do not look upon this bill as a sacred cow and therefore, untouchable. This bill is the synthesis of the thinking and the experience of many responsible citizens who have devoted their time and talents for many years to this problem. This bill is a proposal for a vital need. I would urge that when considered by the great Banking and Currency Committee of the House, which committee undoubtedly will receive the bill, the vast experience of that committee and its brilliant staff with the many problems of the distressed economic areas of our Nation as well as its knowledge of the Government mortgage program, will expedite the passage of this legislation bringing to the bill ideas, suggestions and proposals to insure its success.

I am indebted to numerous civic leaders in my congressional district for their advice and assistance in the preparation of this bill and these remarks particularly Mr. Frank Burnside, Mr. John Hourigan, and Mr. William O. Sword, of Wilkes-Barre, the Wilkes-Barre sparkplugs; Attorney Lou Feldmann, now national commander of the VFW and attorney for the Hazleton Can-Do group; Dr. Edger L. Dessen, the driving force behind the Hazleton operation, and Mr. Clifford Jones, secretary of the Hazleton Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I include in my remarks at this point the following statement and also a copy of my bill, H.R. 12854:

STATEMENT OF NEEDS OF THE GREATER HAZLETON AREA REGARDING DISCOUNTING OF MORTGAGES AND INTERESTS IN PROPERTY BY THE GREATER HAZLETON COMMUNITY-AREA NEW DEVELOPMENT ORGANIZATION, INC., COMMONLY KNOWN AS CAN-DO, INC.

What is to be said in the following paragraphs will apply equally to any area anywhere in the United States which has the following conditions:

1. That it has raised money locally for the community share of industrial development costs.

2. That it is located in any area except the extremely large urban communities of the United States.

The Hazleton area has raised from its local citizens in three drives approximately $2,100,000 to be used for industrial development. The first was the Electric Autolite drive of 1947 which raised $650,000. The second was the Can-Do drive of 1956 which raised approximately $750,000. And the third was the aCn-Do Drive of 1959 to which there was approximately $850,000 paid or pledged.

While the Electric Autolite development in Hazleton did a great deal of good for the community, it also provided to the community—and even to those who took an active part in the drive—that it was not the most desirable way to bring in new industries, since this drive contemplated a certain amount of contribution by the community toward the cost of the building, as well as the repayment by Electric Autolite Co. of a certain percentage of the community funds.

Therefore, Can-Do, Inc., proceeded to operate on a different basis entirely.

This basis is briefly based on the Pennsylvania industrial development act, which provides that the State will provide 30 percent of the cost of an industrial building at varying interest rates (depending on the rate charged by the community), providing that (1) the banks or financial institutions will finance 50 percent of the cost of the building, and (2) that the community will finance 20 percent of the cost of the building.

Can-Do, Inc., proceeded on this basis to build buildings, and these were disposed of in varying ways:

1. By self-amortization leases containing options to purchase.

2. By old-fashioned land contracts.

3. By the use of first, second, and third mortgages.

In the first two plans, Can-Do, Inc., gave to the banks in the Greater Hazleton area its first mortgage for 50 percent. It gave to the State of Pennsylvania (PIDA) its mortgage for 30 percent, and it retained a 20-percent in the building.

Under the lease plan, Can-Do, Inc., originally gave its mortgage to the banks for the 50 percent, its mortgage to PIDA for the second mortgage of 30 percent, and when the building was completed, gave to the industrial firm a deed in fee simple for the property. The industrial development firm, in turn, gave the banks its own first mortgage and bond. The deed contained a provision whereby the industrial firm took the deed, under and subject to and agreeing to pay PIDA its second mortgage. (Pennsylvania law required this.)

Finally, the firm gave to Can-Do, Inc., the firm's mortgage for Can-Do, Inc.'s 20 percent. All mortgages were to be amortized over 15 to 20 years at varying interest rates, depending on the money market.

The following buildings have been constructed by Can-Do, Inc., at approximately the following amounts:

	Cost of building	Bank loan	State loan	"Can-Do's" interest in the building
General Foam Corp.	$400,000	$200,000	$120,000	$80,000
Capitol Products Corp.	425,000	212,500	127,500	85,000
Highway Trailer Co.	1,210,000	605,000	363,000	242,000
Lewis Steel Products Corp.	420,000	210,000	126,000	84,000
New Moon Homes, Inc.	400,000	200,000	120,000	80,000
Spaulding Bakeries, Inc.	925,000	462,500	277,500	185,000
Foldes Industries, Inc.	155,000	77,500	46,500	31,000

We were able to get Lewis Steel Products Corp. to invest $50,000, reducing the local cost to $370,000.

You will note that simple addition will show you that we have, therefore, built $4,868,500 worth of buildings.

It will also show that the banks have invested in mortgages in these buildings $2,434,250. It will also show that the State of Pennsylvania has invested in these buildings $1,460,550. And it will also show that Can-Do, Inc., retains an interest either in fee or by mortgage by $973,700.

Now comes the problem. In the Hazleton area, we have the following banks or lending institutions—banks are limited by law on their loans to any one person or company 10 percent of their capital and surplus but not including their undivided profits—and the law is the same both for State and Federal banks. As a matter of practice, banks will not go over 60 percent in deposits of loans of all kinds; and, therefore, bank loans of the type I have been describing depend on other loans banks have, and this, of course, follows to some extent the market for money. Banks further have a dislike for industrial mortgages, particularly small banks; and some banks refuse to take very many—if any—industrial mortgages at all.

Ignoring all other factors and only considering the limit fixed by law of capital and surplus, banks in the Hazleton area are able to loan at a maximum the following amount of money to any individual or corporation:

Northeastern Pennsylvania National Bank & Trust Co.	$1,100,000
Hazleton National Bank	225,000
First National Bank, Hazleton	110,000
People's Savings & Trust Co.	75,000
Traders Bank & Trust Co.	70,000
Miner's Bank & Trust Co.	32,500
First National Bank, McAdoo	25,000
First National Bank, Freeland	30,000
Citizens' Bank of Freeland	60,000
Conyngham National Bank	17,000
White Haven Savings Bank	20,000
First National Bank, Nuremberg	12,000
Total	1,776,500

Tamaqua banks:

The First National Bank of Tamaqua	107,500
The Tamaqua National Bank	100,000
People Trust Co. of Tamaqua	45,000
First Federal Savings & Loan Association of Hazleton	250,000

Thus, it can readily be seen that one of the greatest problems facing us today is not only getting industry, but also being able to get the money to finance industry. We have solicited our people, and despite the fact we are in what the Government calls a chronic distressed area, we have raised fabulous sums of money; but this cannot go on indefinitely.

Our banks have been very cooperative, but they are faced with limits I have set forth, with the result that if it were not for the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society, we would not have been able to even complete the Spaulding transaction. In giving you the list of firms above with the figures on each building, I have purposely overlooked General Foam Corp., which is now in the process of expanding their plant at a total cost of $400,000 additional—which means $200,000 more from the banks and $120,000 from the State of Pennsylvania, and $80,000 interest retained by Can-Do, Inc.

What I have also purposely overlooked giving you is the fact that because of the impossibility for a considerable period of time of raising the banks' share of the money, we lost an expansion of the Highway Trailer Co. which would have cost $1,250,000, for the simple reason we could not get together bank loan of the necessary $625,000. They just did not have the capacity nor the money.

A. Markle, Jr., who is certainly no amateur in this field, but a man of tremendous experience, finally after many weeks put a package together; but by that time, Highway Trailer Co. changed its mind, and 500 jobs were lost to Hazleton.

You will also note, before I get into details of the act, that the First Federal Savings & Loan Association of Hazleton is listed for $250,000 limit, apparently due to peculiarities of law. This is a "guesstimate."

May I say and repeat—that without the Philadelphia Saving Fund Society and Northeastern Pennsylvania National Bank & Trust Co. and the First Federal Savings & Loan Association of Hazleton, this program would have come to an end 18 months ago. Yet this is the program that has employed well over 1,000 men directly and several thousand indirectly. Now, the proposal of the Hazleton plan is this:

First. That the Government set up a corporation similar to Fannie Mae, with authority to buy and relieve Can-Do, Inc., of its liabilities on the bond, and first mortgages held by banks given by Can-Do, Inc., to the banks in which Can-Do, Inc., is the mortgagor and banks are the mortgagees. (As you know, these are participating mortgages in which a number of banks take part and one bank is named as trustee.) This would eliminate the problem of limitation of capital and surplus imposed by law and free money so that we might bring in other industries and expand existing industries.

Second. Take care of self-imposed restrictions imposed by banks (many of these being limits imposed by bank examiners). This then would release dollars that banks might lend to Can-Do, Inc., and other development organizations.

In other words, to safeguard the Government, I would suggest that the law contain provision of first in-first out. In other words, we would have to ask the Government to first buy the foam rubber mortgage before we can ask them to buy any other mortgage.

Third. I would suggest that provision be made in the law that present trustee continue his duties and collect money for the Government, and that present trustee's fee of one-fourth of 1 percent be paid from the funds collected.

The second part of the act should provide that the Government would be able to buy the interest of the industrial development organization in each of these buildings. This would then allow the industrial development organization to continue to rotate its funds, avoiding the necessity of going back to the people continuously for money; but it would have the advantage of forcing communities to participate if they are to get help. This money should be loaned to the community at a very nominal rate of interest, since one of the difficulties of present procedure is that there is not enough left over to pay interest on bonds or debentures or promises to pay, since some of the money is raised on promises to pay it back, although some are outright gifts.

These, then, are the highlights and important features of this bill. This would insure continued industrial development in any area which was willing to raise some money and could work out some kind of financing plan with either Federal or State aid, or even possibly just with their banks.

However, before closing this, I should point out to you that these are not the only costs of industrial development. It is true we purchased land for $5 an acre and improved that land until it is conservatively appraised for $1,000 an acre for developed parts. But when we say this, we fail to take into consideration what has made it worth the $1,000 an acre. May I respectfully submit to you some of the items:

1. We have had thousands of hours of free work by people of the community in helping to supervise and develop a project.

2. We have had the use of all types of earth-moving equipment firms at prices far below what could be secured from commercial groups.

3. We have built our own sewers and sewer systems—both sanitary and storm.

4. We have built a water system with two deep wells and with pressure that exceeds the pressure of the city of Hazleton.

5. We have planned the area with the assistance of engineers who worked at very small cost laying out a modern industrial park.

6. We have built roads and drainage systems.

Now, in addition to these, we have had cooperation of others, to wit:

1. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania backfilled major strippings which existed in this area at absolutely no cost to us.

2. The county of Luzerne built an entrance to the industrial park and an excellent road at no cost to us.

3. Hazle Township and West Hazleton Borough installed a phone fire alarm system.

4. The Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. cooperated by bringing in high voltage powerlines.

5. The Bell Telephone Co. cooperated by bringing in many and varied services, including teletypes, etc.

Thus, it should be noted that everyone has participated excepting the Federal Government. Yet the hundreds of thousands of dollars which were paid to the Federal Government during the past 3 years in income taxes from people who had no incomes before but now have incomes because they are employed, certainly should of itself justify the Federal Government in offering some help. What we propose is not something that will cost the Federal Government any extensive sum of money. If it is carefully administered without strangling bureaucracy, it can be done very cheaply and with minimum loss to the Government. In fact, if it is well and intelligently administered, the Government can make a profit. This plan envisages nothing except the Government doing what we are unable to do ourselves—and that is finding a market for our mortgages and finding a means of releasing our community funds so that they may turn over again.

While this is called the Hazleton plan, it is only called it because we have had fabulous success so far and we now deal in hard sound practice. We know our weaknesses and know the weaknesses which will develop anywhere; therefore, we respectfully submit this plan to you.

A bill to promote the redevelopment of economically depressed areas by establishing a Government corporation which will provide a secondary market for industrial mortgages covering property in those areas

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Redevelopment Area Industrial Mortgage Association Act."

PURPOSE

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to establish in the Federal Government a secondary market facility for industrial mortgages which will provide a degree of liquidity for industrial mortgage investments in economically depressed areas and improve the distribution of investment capital available for industrial mortgage financing, and to provide that the operations of such facility shall be financed by private capital to the maximum extent feasible.

CREATION OF ASSOCIATION

SEC. 3. There is hereby created in the executive branch of the Federal Government a body corporate to be known as the "Redevelopment Area Industrial Mortgage Association." The Association shall have succession until dissolved by Act of Congress. It shall maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia and shall be deemed for purposes of venue in civil actions to be a resident thereof. Agencies or offices may be established by the Association in such other places as it may deem necessary or appropriate in the conduct of its business.

CAPITALIZATION

SEC. 4. (a) The Association shall have nonvoting common stock; and initially shall also have nonvoting preferred stock to which the Secretary of the Treasury shall subscribe as provided in subsections (d) and (e) of this section. All stock of the Association shall have a par value of $100 per share, and shall not be transferable except on the books of the Association. At the option of the Association all such stock shall be retirable at par value at any time, except that retirements of common stock shall not be made if, as a consequence, the amount thereof remaining outstanding would be less than $10 million. With respect to the preferred stock held by him, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be entitled to cumulative dividends for each fiscal year or portion thereof, from the date or dates the capital represented by such preferred stock is initially utilized until such preferred stock is retired, at rates determined by him at the beginning of each such fiscal year, taking into consideration the current average interest rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the preceding fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury shall permit the retirement of the preferred stock held by him in the manner provided in this section. Funds of the capital surplus and the general surplus accounts of the Association shall be available to retire the preferred stock held by the Secretary of the Teasury as rapidly as the Association shall deem feasible. Concurrently with the retirement of the last of such outstanding shares of preferred stock, the Association shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury for covering into miscellaneous receipts an amount equal to that part of the general surplus and reserves of the Association (other than reserves established to provide for any depreciation in value of its assets, including mortgages) which shall be deemed to have been earned through the use of the capital represented by the shares held by him from time to time. The amount of such payment shall be determined by applying to such surplus and reserves that percentage which is equivalent to the proportion borne by the employed capital represented by the Secretary's stock to the total employed capital of the Association, computed monthly to the aforesaid retirement of the last of the outstanding shares of preferred stock of the Association.

(b) The Association shall accumulate funds for its capital surplus account from private sources by requiring each mortgage seller to make payments of nonrefundable capital contributions, equal to not more than 2 per centum nor less than 1 per centum of the unpaid principal amounts of mortgages purchased or to be purchased by the Association from such seller under section 5, as determined from time to time by the Association, taking into consideration conditions in the mortgage market and the general economy. In addition, the Association may impose charges or fees for its services with the objective that all costs and expenses of its operations should be within its income derived from such operations and that such operations should be fully self-supporting. All earnings from the operations of the Association shall annually be transferred to its general surplus account. At any time, funds of the general surplus account may, in the discretion of the board of directors, be transferred to reserves. All dividends shall be charged against the general surplus account.

(c) The Association shall issue, from time to time, to each mortgage seller its common stock (only in denominations of $100 or multiples thereof) evidencing any capital contributions made by such seller pursuant to subsection (b). Such dividends as may be declared by the board of directors in its discretion shall be paid by the Association to the holders of its common stock, but in any one fiscal year the general surplus account of the Association shall not be reduced through the payment of dividends applicable to such common stock which exceed in the aggregate 5 per centum of the par value of the outstanding common stock of the Association: Provided, That pending the retirement of all the outstanding preferred stock of the Association such percentage with respect to any one fiscal year shall not exceed the percentage rate of the cumulative dividend applicable to the preferred stock of the Association for that fiscal year.

(d) Within ninety days following the date of the enactment of this Act, the Association is authorized and directed to issue and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to accept, preferred stock of the Association having an aggregate par value equal to $10,000,000.

(e) The preferred stock of the Association delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to subsection (d) shall be in exchange for a note or notes of the Association, aggregating $10,000,000 in principal amount (and upon which the accrued interest shall have been paid through the date of delivery), held by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to the authority contained in section 5(e).

(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any institution, including a national bank or State member bank of the Federal Reserve System or any member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, trust company, or other banking organization, organized under any law of the United States, including the laws relating to the District of Columbia, shall be authorized to make payments to the Association of the nonrefundable capital contributions referred to in subsection (b) of this section, to receive stock of the Association evidencing such capital contributions, and to hold or dispose of such stock, subject to the provisions of this title.

(g) As promptly as practicable after all of the preferred stock of the Association held by the Secretary of the Treasury has been retired, the president of the Association shall transmit to the Congress recommendations for such legislation as may be necessary or desirable to the owners of the outstanding common stocks of the Association the assets and liabilities of the Association in connection with, and the control and management of, the operations of the Association under section 5 in order that such operations may thereafter be carried out by a privately owned and privately financed corporation.

EXERCISE OF SECONDARY MARKET FUNCTION

SEC. 5. (a) In order to carry out the purpose of this Act, the Association is authorized, pursuant to commitments or otherwise, to purchase, service, or sell industrial mortgages (as defined in section 6(a)) covering property located in industrial redevelopment areas (as defined in section 6(b)).

(b) The operations of the Association under this Act shall be confined to industrial mortgages which are deemed by the Association to constitute a reasonable risk and which in the judgment of the Association cover construction or other projects that will contribute to the economic development of the industrial redevelopment area in which the property involved is located. In the interest of assuring sound operation, the prices to be paid by the Association for industrial mortgages purchased under this Act shall be established, from time to time, within the range of market prices for the particular type and class of mortgages involved, as determined by the Association. The volume of the Association's purchases and sales and the establishment of the purchase prices, sales prices, and charges or fees, in its operations under this Act, shall be determined by the Association from time to time with the objectives that (1) such purchases and sales will be effected only at such prices and on such terms as will reasonably prevent excessive use of the Association's facilities, (2) the operations of the Association under this Act will be fully self-supporting, and (3) purchases of industrial mortgages will be made on such terms as to permit the mortgage seller to hold and service the loan on behalf of the Association in appropriate cases.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act—

(1) any advance commitment to purchase mortgages in operations under this Act shall be issued only at prices which are sufficient to facilitate industrial financing but which are sufficiently below the price then offered by the Association for immediate purchase to prevent excessive sales to the Association pursuant to such commitments;

(2) no mortgage may be purchased at a price exceeding 100 per centum of the unpaid principal amount thereof at the time of purchase, with adjustments for interest and any comparable items;

(3) the Association may not purchase any mortgage unless it covers property which is located in an industrial redevelopment area and the development of such property with the financial assistance afforded by the mortgage will contribute significantly (as determined by the Association) to the economic redevelopment of such area; and

(4) no limitation may be set by the Association on the age of industrial mortgages which it will purchase, or (except as specifically provided in this Act) on the type or types of industrial mortgages which it will purchase.

(d) For the purposes of this section, the Association is authorized to issue, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and have outstanding at any one time obligations having such maturities and bearing such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the Association with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be redeemable at the option of the Association before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated in such obligations; but the aggregate amount of obligations of the Association under this subsection outstanding at any one time shall not exceed ten times the sum of its capital, capital surplus, general surplus, reserves, and undistributed earnings, and in no event shall any such obligations be issued if, at the time of such proposed issuance, and as a consequence thereof, the resulting aggregate amount of its outstanding obligations under this subsection would exceed the amount of the Association's ownership pursuant to this section, free from any liens or encumbrances, of cash, mortgages, and bonds or other obligations of, or bonds or of cash, mortgages, and obligations of the United States or guaranteed thereby, or obligations which are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds. The Association shall insert appropriate language in all of its obligations issued under this subsection clearly indicating that such obligations, together with the interest thereon, are not guaranteed by the United States and do not constitute a debt or obligation of the United States or of any agency or instrumentality thereof other than the Association. The Association is authorized to purchase in the open market any of its obligations outstanding under this subsection at any time and at any price.

(e) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to purchase any obligations issued pursuant to subsection (d) of this section, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act are extended to include such purchases. The Secretary of the Treasury shall not at any time purchase any obligations under this subsection if (1) all of the preferred stock of the Association held by the Secretary of the Treasury has been retired, or (2) such purchase would increase the aggregate principal amount of his then outstanding holdings of such obligations under this subsection to an amount greater than $225,000,000. Each purchase of obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a return at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the making of such purchase. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine, any of the obligations acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such obligations under this subsection shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

DEFINITION OF INDUSTRIAL MORTGAGE AND INDUSTRIAL REDEVELOPMENT AREA

SEC. 6. (a) As used in this Act, the term "industrial mortgage" means a mortgage or other lien which—

(1) covers land or facilities (including machinery and equipment) acquired or developed for industrial usage, or factory buildings constructed, rehabilitated, converted, or enlarged for industrial or related commercial uses, in an industrial redevelopment area; and

(2) is given to secure a loan made by a bank or other financial institution located within or outside such industrial redevelopment area, or by an industrial development corporation authorized to carry on its operations in such area by the State in which such area is located.

(b) (1) As used in this Act, the term "industrial redevelopment area" means at any given time an area in which—

(A) the rate of unemployment, excluding unemployment due primarily to temporary or seasonal factors, is currently 6 per centum or more and has averaged at least 6 per centum for any of the qualifying time periods specified in subparagraph (B);

(B) the average annual rate of unemployment has been at least—

(i) 50 per centum above the national average for four of the five preceding calendar years; or

(ii) 75 per centum above the national average for three of the four preceding calendar years; or

(iii) 100 per centum above the national average for two of the preceding three calendar years; and

(C) nonagricultural employment has declined, or has shown a smaller increase than in the country as a whole, during the preceding five calendar years;

but an area in which the average annual rate of unemployment has been in excess of 8 per centum for three of the preceding four calendar years shall in any event constitute an industrial redevelopment area.

(2) The Secretary of Labor shall from time to time, or upon the request of the Association (or at the request of the appropriate State agency, instrumentality, or political subdivision), certify to the Association as industrial redevelopment areas any areas where he finds, on the basis of available labor force data or studies initiated by him, that the conditions specified in paragraph (1) exist. In the case of any labor market area for which appropriate historical labor force data have not been compiled, the Secretary may certify such area as an industrial redevelopment area if the unemployment rate and duration in such area, based on a survey of available labor force data, generally equals or exceeds the applicable rate and duration specified in paragraph (1).

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

SEC. 7. The Association shall have a Board of Directors consisting of five persons appointed by the President of the United States (who shall designate one of such persons as Chairman of the Board) from among the officers or employees of the Association or (with the consent of the head of such department or agency) of any other department or agency of the Federal Government. The Board of Directors shall meet at the call of its Chairman, who shall require it to meet not less often than once each month. Within the limitations of law, the Board shall determine the general policies which shall govern the operations of the Association. The Chairman of the Board shall select and effect the appointment of qualified persons to fill the offices of President and Vice President, and such other offices as may be provided for in the bylaws, with such executive functions, powers, and duties as may be prescribed by the bylaws or by the Board of Directors, and such persons shall be the executive officers of the Association and shall discharge all such executive functions, powers, and duties. The basic rate of compensation of the position of President of the Association shall be the same as the basic rate of compensation established for the head of the Federal National Mortgage Association. The members of the Board, as such, shall not receive compensation for their services.

GENERAL POWERS OF THE ASSOCIATION

SEC. 8. (a) In the exercise of its functions under this Act the Association shall have power—

(1) to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal, which shall be judicially noticed;

(2) by its Board of Directors to adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws governing the performance of the functions, powers, and duties imposed upon it by law:

(3) to enter into and perform contracts, leases, cooperative agreements, or other transactions, on such terms as it may deem appropriate, with any agency or instrumentality of the United States, or with any State, territory, or possession, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or with any political subdivision thereof, or with any person, firm, association, or corporation;

(4) to execute, in accordance with its bylaws, all instruments necessary or appropriate in the exercise of any of its functions or powers;

(5) in its corporate name, to sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal, but no attachment, injunction, or other similar process, mesne or final, shall be issued against the property of the Association or against the Association with respect to its property;

(6) to conduct its business in any State of the United States, including the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States;

(7) to lease, purchase, or acquire any property, real, personal, or mixed, or any interest therein, to hold, rent, maintain, modernize, renovate, improve, use, and operate such property, and to sell, for cash or credit, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same, at such time and in such manner as and to the extent that the Association may deem necessary or appropriate:

(8) to prescribe, repeal, and amend or modify rules, regulations, or requirements governing the manner in which its general business may be conducted;

(9) to accept gifts or donations of services, or of property, real, personal, or mixed, tangible or intangible, in aid of any of its purposes; and

(10) to do all things necessary or incidental to the proper management of its affairs and the proper conduct of its business.

(b) Except as may be otherwise provided in this Act, in the Government Corporation Control Act, or in other laws specifically applicable to Government corporations, the Association shall determine the necessity for and the character and amount of its obligations and expenditures and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, paid, and accounted for.

(c) The Association, including its franchise, capital, reserve, surplus, mortgages, and income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, except that (1) any real property of the Association shall be subject to State, territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed, and (2) the Association shall pay annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, for covering into miscellaneous receipts, an amount equivalent to the amount of Federal income taxes for which it would be subject if it were not exempt from such taxes with respect to its operations.

(d) The Chairman of the Board shall have power to select and appoint or employ such officers, attorneys, employees, and agents, to vest them with such powers and duties, and to fix and to cause the Association to pay such compensation to them for their services, as he may determine, subject to the civil service and classification laws. Bonds may be required for the faithful performance of their duties, and the Association may pay the premiums therefor. With the consent of any Government corporation or Federal Reserve bank, or of any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department of the Government, the Association may avail itself on a reimbursable basis of the use of information, services, facilities, officers, and employees thereof, including any field service thereof, in carrying out the provisions of this Act.

BILL FOR RELIEF OF TARPON SPRINGS SPONGE INDUSTRY—TO PUT DOMESTIC SPONGES ON A FAIR COMPETITIVE BASIS WITH IMPORTED SPONGES

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to prohibit the importation into the United States of commercial sponges measuring less than 5 inches in diameter.

Tarpon Springs, Fla., the largest and only major commercial sponge producing area in the country, is in my district. In the middle 1940's, the industry soared to a $3 million or more a year gross, and aided other industries indirectly, but a blight destroyed many of the sponge beds in the early 1950's, and the competition from synthetic and foreign sponges has reduced the once great industry to around $200,000 a year. It is important to note that in even greater and better quality than before the beds have regrown, but the markets have not been recovered.

I have been reliably informed that there are sponges being imported into the United States that are less than 5 inches in diameter; however, there are laws on our statute books preventing the taking in this country of such sponges by our commercial producers, both Federal and State laws, and rightfully so. The minimum size law was put into effect as a conservation measure for biological control. The primary purpose of any conservation measure, of course, is to make it possible to harvest the largest crop, or obtain the greatest return from any natural resource. As applied to sponge production this conservation measure of legal size limit is probably the only effective means of control.

Foreign sponges competing unfairly in this respect include those from Cuba, the Mediterranean, as well as other foreign sources. To protect the American sponge industry, a tariff was established which applied to all countries except Cuba, which has a 20-percent preferential on all products. In September 1934 a trade agreement between the United States and Cuba provided for a reduction in the rate of duty on velvet sponges from 20 percent to 12 percent, and the rate of duty on sponges not specially provided for was reduced from 12 percent to 6 percent. This included hardhead, reef, and all other sponges.

At present, commercial sponge resources of the United States are protected both by an act of Congress and by the laws of the State of Florida. The act of Congress—Public Law No. 172, approved August 15, 1914; 38 Stat. 6921—prohibits the capture in waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida which are outside the limits of territorial jurisdiction, of sponges measuring less than 5 inches in diameter when wet. This act also forbids the landing, curing, possession, or sale of sponges less than that size and provides penalties for violation. The laws of Florida contain substantially the same prohibitions with respect to catching and marketing sponges within the territorial limits of the State. A State law also provides that hooks used in removing sponges from the bottom shall be 5 inches wide and prohibits the use of diving equipment for taking sponges within the territorial limits of the State.

Since 1948 the number of diving boats working the Florida sponge beds has steadily declined. In 1953 there were fewer than 20 diving boats operating full time in the Florida sponge fishery.

The bottom of the Gulf of Mexico is now covered with sponges and is a beautiful garden of fine and high quality Rock Island sponges. However, the Federal Government's buying specifications fail to give Florida sponges a fair break and actually favor Cuban and Nassau sponges. This, in addition to the fact that imports can be permitted of sponges less than 5 inches in diameter, directly in competition with domestic sponges, places our own domestic producers, who cannot take such sponges themselves according to law, at a tremendous disadvantage, and the purpose of my bill, of course, is to place our commercial producers on an equal footing with foreign producers.

I might add that, through contact with the General Services Administration, I requested that a survey be made to learn if there is a basis on which domestic sponges may compete more effectively with foreign sponges, and such a survey is now under way, I understand. The GSA is also planning to include sponges to be procured on the basis of type I Rock Island produced in Tarpon Springs in the September 1960 edition of the GSA "Stores Stock Catalog."

In terms of value the United States leads the world in natural sponge production, while Cuba supplies the greatest quantity, but this unfair foreign competition must be brought to a halt. Foreign imports below the domestically enforced 5-inch minimum limit permit foreign sponge products to undercut domestic prices and quality and thus absorb most of the domestic market. Without some relief, this sick industry will die and this product, needed in wartime, will disappear from domestic production.

Cuba, with its attitude toward the United States, should not continue to get such favored treatment.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Van Zandt Bill H.R. 12395, Requiring Users of Inland Waterways To Pay a User's Charge Will Serve To Eliminate Unfair Competition Existing in our Nationwide Transportation System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, since May 25, 1960, when I introduced H.R. 12395, it is gratifying to observe the widespread interest in the proposed legislation.

The bill would establish the Inland Navigation Commission and authorize the provision and collection of fair and reasonable charges for use of inland waterway navigational improvements, constructed, maintained, or operated with Federal funds, and for other purposes.

There is scant opposition to the user charge principle. Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, and Dwight D. Eisenhower have all publicly urged the imposition of such charges for the use of publicly provided transportation facilities.

The Van Zandt bill, H.R. 12395, would correct an inequitable situation in the field of transportation arising from the fact that those who operate on our inland waterways have never paid a user charge.

It should be emphasized that users of the federally subsidized inland waterways, built and maintained at taxpayer expense, have never paid the Government anything for either the construction of or operating on these costly facilities. Federal expenditures for navigation on the inland and intracoastal waterways have aggregated more than $2.6 billion and have been increasing rapidly in recent years. Such expenditures have risen steadily from $57.2 million in 1955 to $145 million in 1959.

Mr. Speaker, there is no denial of the fact that barge-line operations on our inland waterways form a mature and financially strong industry. As such, that industry should be required to take its place in transportation, on a self-sustaining basis, bearing its own costs under conditions of fair competition with other modes of transportation. Mr. G. C. Taylor, president of the Mississippi Barge Lines Co., stated before the Subcommittee on Surface Transportation of the U.S. Senate, 85th Congress, on behalf of the Inland Waterways Common Carriers Association, that the common carrier barge-line members handled 24 billion ton-miles of freight in 1957 and collected revenues of $96 million. Mr. Taylor also stated that their rates averaged about 4 mills per ton-mile as against 14 mills for the railroads. An analysis of these nine common carrier barge-line members on the Mississippi River System that reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission indicates that the average rate of return on investment for transportation purposes in 1957 amounted to 16.74 percent of unamortized investment before income taxes and 10.38 percent of unamortized investment after income taxes.

These figures clearly reveal that the barge lines can well afford to pay their own way rather than to continue to expect the overburdened American taxpayers to "pick up the check" for them. Therefore there is nothing to justify annual appropriations year after year from funds paid into the Treasury by general taxpayers.

"Transportation Lines on the Mississippi River System and the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway for 1959," a Corps of Engineers publication, lists a total of 1,012 carriers on these waterways, which are classified as follows: 34 common carriers, 13 contract carriers, and 965 exempt carriers. The latter class is privileged to operate on the waterways without regulatory control, and it assumes no responsibility for public or common carrier service. It is estimated that an additional 230 inland waterway carriers operate on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, making a total of approximately 1,240 for all inland waterways.

These carriers handled 109 billion ton-miles of cargo in 1958. Assuming revenue or value in lieu of revenue of 4.5 mills per ton-mile, the volume would equal $490 million. These data confirm that inland waterway barge line operations are a large and well-established industry. There is no longer any pretext of justification for these operators, in union with other proponents of navigation projects, to come to the Congress annually asking for, or, in fact, demanding, large appropriations from the Treasury to provide, improve, and maintain waterways which facilitate their commercial operations for private gain at taxpayer expense.

Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of this country should have long-overdue relief from the burden of financing the ever-increasing demands of the waterway operators and their advocates. They clamor for appropriations from the Treasury not only to cover the operation and maintenance cost of existing navigation improvements, but in addition, the cost of extravagant enlargements and extensions of existing waterways. These users of our waterways also enjoy the benefits from the creation of new projects year by year—all of this with no provision whatever for reimbursement of the Treasury for the facilities and services furnished them by the public. These extortionate demands are always asserted, and justification attempted by a claim of cheap and economical transportation. I ask in all fairness: How can transportation be called economical or cheap when it falls upon the Federal Government to absorb a great share of the cost? How can this transportation be termed economical when the burden is carried by the general tax receipts of the Federal Government and, therefore, by all the taxpayers rather than the users of the waterway and the operators of carrier lines?

The present value of the depreciated federally built structures on our inland waterway system is estimated to be approximately $1.5 billion, with annual operating and maintenance expenses of approximately $44 million. These expenditures by the Federal Government are pure subsidies. They constitute an outright gift of $1,200,000 with an additional maintenance donation of $35,000 year after year to each and every one of the 1,240 operating carriers. Obviously, these subsidies would not be evenly divided or accrue among the various operators; rather they accrue to a relatively few large corporations and industries that can well afford to pay the full cost of the transportation services and facilities they receive.

Approximately 93 percent of all barge traffic on the Mississippi River system, which includes the mainstem of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, is limited to eight classes of commodities. These commodities are listed below, with the percentage of total traffic represented by each class:

Sand, gravel, and crushed rock	12.1
Waterway improvement materials	3.8
Grains	3.0
Iron and steel manufacturing	3.0
Shells, unmanufactured	1.9
Industrial chemicals	1.3

All other class of commodities produce less than 7 percent of the total barge traffic. This further emphasizes the limited numbers of industries and corporations which gain directly from the ever-increasing Federal expenditures on inland navigation improvements and maintenance.

A user charge of approximately 1.5 mills per ton-mile on cargo vessels and a nominal user charge set up for other craft, would be established under the provisions of the Van Zandt bill, H.R. 12395. My bill would provide adequate revenues to insure that (1) the present useful inland waterway improvements could be equitably amortized; (2) that the operation and maintenance of the inland waterways could be financed; and (3) that adequate funds would accumulate to provide for the repair and replacement of existing structures and the provision of new structures as required by the waterway users and approved by the Congress. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12395 will, in fact, free the long-abused taxpayers of this country from an unjust and ever-increasing burden of expenditures for transportation facilities for the advantage of a very limited group. It will place the responsibility for financing these facilities squarely upon the commercial interests who can best judge the economic value of their own demands. In conclusion H.R. 12395 will not impede, but will positively enhance, the efficiency and economy of our transportation system. Furthermore, it will lend dignity and responsibility to the demands of carriers that operate on our inland waterway system. And finally it will be instrumental in eliminating the waste that now exists in our inland waterway navigation programs.

Mr. Louis Hardtla of Philo, Ohio, Honored by the Weather Bureau

OF
HON. JOHN E. HENDERSON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today, Mr. Louis Hardtla, of Philo, which is in the 15th Congressional District of Ohio, will receive the Thomas Jefferson Award for 1960 from the Weather Bureau of the U.S. Department of Commerce. Mr. Hardtla is one of seven who have been selected from the United States for outstanding service in the field of weather observation and reporting.

The citation which he receives with his award reads as follows:

For an exceptionally long record of continuous climatological observations at Philo, Ohio, begun by Mr. Hardtla, because of his own scientific interest in 1892 and then continued as a cooperative observer for the U.S. Weather Bureau since 1901.

Mr. Hardtla, throughout these many years, has made a great contribution to the Weather Bureau and to the Nation. His observations and study have contributed in large measure to the overall study of weather conditions. I am proud that a constituent of mine has been chosen to receive this award and I extend to him my own congratulations and thanks.

OF
HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI
OF ILLINOIS
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am in basic agreement with the statements and explanation by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] as he presents to us the conference report on the defense appropriations bill. I especially concur with his premise that the Communist threat is certainly not greater or more dangerous than it was 6 months ago. Certainly we do have the responsibility, fortified with the realization that the cold war will be with us for many years, to maintain our world military position and present armed superiority must be maintained and, of course, increased. This $40 billion defense budget provides basically for the necessary improvements we continue to make in our military program, and gives our Armed Forces the ability to deter war because of our overwhelming strength as compared with the boastful, but much exaggerated, Soviet military machine.

However, Mr. Speaker, I feel very strongly that we have an obligation to the American taxpayer to study all details of the defense budget, since spending, as it does, half the Federal annual expenditure, the possibility of waste and extravagance is obvious.

I do not wish the statement that I will now make to reflect upon the competence, loyalty, or devotion to duty of our military leaders, but the plain facts are that there is as much, if not more, careless administration and waste in the Defense Department than in any other governmental agency. Frankly, one of the hangovers of World War II and the Korean war has been the pampered state of our top military officials, who hold themselves above civilian criticism of their spending.

Mr. Speaker, we must, as I pointed out, in our duty to the taxpayers we represent, insist that our military leaders provide us with not only the strongest force in the world, as they have done, but, equally important, do so with the utmost efficiency and conservation of a greatest resource: the American dollar. In my humble opinion, we could, today, save 10 percent of the dollars to be spent and provide completely for our Nation's defense if the military leaders would practice true economy in all phases of our Military Establishment. Mr. Speaker, may I repeat, my statement is one that I am sure a great majority of my colleagues concur in, since we have received in communications from our constituents, a clear mandate that whenever possible we must reduce the back-breaking tax burden that rests upon the American public. It would be a tragic thing to yield to the false theory advocated by the pseudo-liberal leftwing element here who believe that their duty is to recklessly spend as much of the American public's money as they can lay their hands on. We are determined, as we pass this defense appropriation to battle communism abroad. We cannot surrender to socialism here. This defense appropriation worked out so carefully by Members of both bodies provides each of our armed services with the weapons they need to continue their stalwart defense, not only of our Nation but of free people throughout the world. It is true that the interservice rivalry continues, and that the differences of opinion within this appropriation remains, but overall this is a sound, practical defense appropriation maintaining and increasing our military superiority over the Soviet Union.

The Influence of the Federal Government on the National Economy—Address by Senator Butler

HON. JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I had the pleasure yesterday morning of addressing some 400 public and parochial schoolteachers of Baltimore at their annual workshop on economics. Yesterday was Government Day, and I was afforded the opportunity of discussing "The Influence of the Federal Government on the National Economy." As I pointed out, "In order for us to maintain our position as leaders of the free world, the time has come for prudence in spending the hard-earned income of American producers by every level of government."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my speech before the Baltimore teachers' workshop, as well as certain charts and explanatory comments which serve to complement my speech.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in RECORD, as follows:

THE INFLUENCE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ON THE NATIONAL ECONOMY

I believe that the future of this country lies in your hands. I believe that because you teachers gathered here today are the prime molders of the minds of our youth who will lead this Nation tomorrow. And so what you think and what you teach will determine the course of the United States for generations to come. You are bound, therefore, with a serious and challenging responsibility. I know that you do not consider this duty lightly nor indifferent. These are indeed serious times, challenging times, when all of us must give fully and completely of ourselves.

It is not a time to bewail our troubles and mistakes to pick and probe feverishly at where we went wrong or how we could have done better. It is not a time to be discouraged or despondent. It is a time to realize that the Soviets want to bury us completely and thoroughly and that we must be prepared to bury them—if necessary.

These are challenging times, but it is not only the challenge of the Soviets, whose unremitting efforts to win the world to their cause has had some temporary success, of which I am speaking, but the challenge of those people here at home who would turn the present crisis, unwittingly perhaps, into what I consider a most imminent and fearful possibility—bankruptcy and economic ruin of the Federal Government.

I, for one, refuse to discard as archaic and inefficient the free enterprise and balanced budget methods which have produced this marvelous Nation, which is still the strongest and the freest in the world.

And so I am going to talk this morning about the influence of the Federal Government on the national economy and some of the dangerous emergency proposals which come too often before the Senate.

Ladies and gentlemen, there are many proposals currently before the Congress to establish new programs involving large expenditures by the Federal Government which were not included in the President's budget. Some of these measures may be worthy if there were not so many other existing commitments and they would certainly prove beneficial to a great number of our citizens.

Yet, as a member of the Senate Finance Committee and the Joint Economic Committee. I have become increasingly concerned with the impact of these many proposed programs on the Federal budget and the national economy and with the question of how we are to finance them.

The decade of the sixties will be a time of serious challenge to our Nation, and indeed to our way of life. The economic offensive launched by the Communist nations will require a rededication to the principles of our free enterprise economy. At the same time we must keep up our military strength, and we must marshal all our resources to maintain and strengthen our position of world leadership. To accomplish these ends will require a healthy, strong, and growing economy.

The budget which was proposed by President Eisenhower for the fiscal year 1961 calls for revenues of $84 billion and expenditures of $79.8 billion, leaving a surplus of $4.2 billion to be applied toward reducing our public debt of $284.5 billion. The public debt, which has now reached a per capita level of approximately $1,580 for each of our 180 million citizens is fantastically high.

Yet, if we add the liabilities of an estimated $350 billion of future obligations for retirement benefits for civilian Government employees and military personnel and future pensions and compensations to veterans and an estimated $98 billion of commitments for future spending for highways, public works programs, public housing, unexpended balances in the defense program, and a variety of other obligations. We arrive at the astronomical total of a $732 billion mortgage on America's future.

In the closing days of the Congress, every Senator and every Congressman will be examining many proposals requiring additional Federal spending. An even cursory study of the budget reveals that once such programs become embedded in our statutes, they are never eliminated. Indeed, history shows that these measures grow and expand from year to year.

An excellent example of the practice we have followed for many years is provided by an examination of expenditures for public assistance programs. At the time that the Congress liberalized the old-age and survivors' insurance program in 1950, we contemplated that expenditures for public assistance would ultimately decline.

The intent of the Congress is clearly revealed in Report No. 1669 of the Senate Finance Committee dated May 16, 1950, which discussed the amendments embodied in H.R. 6000, 81st Congress. It stated that:

"The committee-approved bill is designed to have the insurance program become the basic method. The strengthening of old-age and survivors insurance will reduce the need for public-assistance expenditures. The broad extension of coverage, the increase in benefits, and the liberalized eligibility requirements of the insurance program will decrease the number of people who will have to depend on the assistance programs * * *."

This statement was made in 1950 when budget expenditures for public assistance totaled $1,039 million. The 1961 budget estimate for this program submitted by President Eisenhower on January 18, 1960, proposes expenditures of $2,087 million. In other words, although coverage had been extended, a program which was destined to decrease in importance doubled in size during a decade. This illustrates the need for extreme caution in embarking upon new programs which may require modest financial obligations at the time they are suggested.

The economic facts of life are such that we have only two alternatives we can use to finance these expenditures. We must either go into debt, or we must increase our tax revenues.

The dangers and serious consequences of a continuous budget deficit need not be recounted. The experience of many European countries in the postwar period have demonstrated beyond a doubt that inflation and depreciated currency are not mere phantoms. Events here in the United States have proved that a firm stand must be taken to preserve the integrity of the dollar. Our current balance-of-payments problem should serve as a constant reminder that unless we maintain competitive prices in world markets and bring about a balance in terms of our international payments, we are headed for serious trouble. In 1949 U.S. gold stocks reached a postwar high of $24.6 billion. At the end of April of this year, they stand at $19.4 billion, a decline of $5.2 billion. It is self-evident that this trend must be halted if our economic system is to survive. In fact, the claims on our gold at Fort Knox, if they were all exercised, would completely absorb our reserves.

Ladies and gentlemen, an examination of the budget outlined by President Eisenhower last January shows that interest payments represent 12 percent of expenditures; general Government, 2.4 percent; major national security programs, 57.1 percent; international affairs and finance, 2.8 percent; veterans' services and benefits, 6.9 percent; agriculture and agricultural resources, 7 percent; labor and welfare, 5.7 percent; commerce and housing, 3.4 percent; natural resources, 2.4 percent; and allowances for contingenies, 0.3 percent. On the revenue side, corporation income taxes are expected to contribute 28 percent of revenues, individual income taxes, 52 percent, and excise and other taxes 20 percent.

The original budget prepared last January will bear little resemblance to the appropriations and authorizations provided by the present Congress. For example, the President requested an increase in postal rates which apparently will not be granted. Furthermore, within the past few days the Senate has adopted bills that would add more than $2 billion to the budget, which was presented by President Eisenhower last January, and the end is not yet in sight since there will certainly be additional spending bills, including programs not provided for in the budget before we finally adjourn.

For example, the tax rate on corporation profits presently stands at 52 percent. The Federal Government is the senior partner in every corporation with a taxable income in excess of $25,000. It derives more revenue from the enterprise than the investors who risk their capital to provide jobs for our people and the goods and services that we need.

Accordingly, if more Federal revenues are needed, they will have to be raised by increased personal income taxes in the lower and middle brackets. Yet we are all aware that today the average employee is most concerned with his take-home pay. If further tax withholding reduces take-home pay, organized labor will of necessity demand higher wages. These added labor costs will in turn have to be factored into higher prices. Further price increases will only aggravate the problem of foreign competition with which we are now faced and will ultimately result in more problems of unemployment, depressed areas, and a lower standard of living.

There have been many bills which were passed by both Houses of the Congress to establish new programs but which were vetoed by the President. In and of themselves some of them may have been worthy, but the problem now is one of priorities. It is important that every voter understand that if additional demands for Federal funds are pressed upon the Congress, they can only be met through increased taxes that will raise his cost of living and lower his take-home pay.

This is not a time when any of us should be solely concerned with the merits or demerits of specific programs but rather with the simple fact of how we can pay for them and how they will ultimately add to the growth of our tax base.

I would like to quote from a recent speech given by Mr. Maurice H. Stans, Director of the Bureau of the Budget at the annual dinner of the Tax Foundation in New York. Mr. Stans said:

"Except for its dimensions, the Federal budget is parallel to a family's budget, as a plan for living, with its goals, its fixed costs, its choices among variables, its contingencies, and above all its relevance to what we can afford within our means. The simple idea that whatever is spent must somehow be covered by what is earned would help to dissipate the widespread delusion that in some strange way when money comes from Washington it doesn't cost anybody anything."

Ladies and gentlemen, plans for participation by the Federal Government in our economy must be designed to meet only those requirements which cannot be covered through the exercise of local resources and initiative.

President Eisenhower in his budget message of January 18, 1960, said:

"I believe that the American people have made their wishes clear: The Federal Government should conduct its financial affairs with a high sense of responsibility vigorously meeting the Nation's needs and opportunities within its proper sphere while at the same time exercising a prudent discipline in matters of borrowing and spending, and in incurring liabilities for the future."

The high sense of responsibility and prudent discipline to which President Eisenhower referred should be ever before legislators as they consider any legislative proposals until this country has demonstrated over a reasonable period of time that our budget is balanced and our national finances are in proper order.

It is most important to allow local authorities the right to tax. We are in effect making an indirect contribution to State and local governments to assume added responsibilities by allowing them to issue securities, the income from which is exempt from Federal taxation. In 1951 the spending program of the States totaled $15.3 billion. It has more than doubled in the short span of 9 years to $32 billion in 1959.

In the years ahead there will be added demands because of population increases and the movement from concentrated urban areas to the suburbs. There has been increased pressure on the States in terms of their own financial problems which must be met by the same individuals who support the Federal Government. An unhealthy fiscal situation has developed because population growth and concentration have occurred in urban and suburban areas, with the total population increasing about 30 million between 1946 and 1957. Over half of this growth was in the nonproductive group of citizens who are in school, in the age group from 5 to 17, or those who have retired and are 65 years of age and over.

In spite of additional Federal programs, State and local governments have been burdened with added costs for public assistance and other social welfare programs. More schoolteachers are needed to meet the educational requirements of our expanded youth population. The number of motor vehicles has grown from 34 million in 1946 to 68 million in 1959. All these factors add to the cost of Government—National, State, and local. I am a fervent believer in having as many of these activities conducted by the States and their subdivisions as possible since I am convinced that any Government activity carried on under the close observation of those who are paying for it will probably result in greater efficiency. However, regardless of how these programs are financed, they are imposing an ever-larger burden of taxes on those who constitute the civilian labor force of less than 70 million out of a population of almost 180 million.

In order for us to maintain our position as leaders of the free world, the time has come for prudence in spending the hard-earned income of American producers by every level of government.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it was my great privilege to address a group of leading business and professional men of the tristate area of which Pittsburgh is the center, known as the Amen Corner group, in the spring of 1959. At this time I pointed out a danger which has since become a reality. I append hereto certain statements which I made before this group, including a table, which were inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 23, 1959, to be printed at this point in the RECORD:

Our tax system deters thrift. In these days, when the Government requires the maximum possible revenue, progressive tax rates which exceed the point of diminishing returns represent fiscal irresponsibility at its worst. What is not generally recognized is the fact that our progressive income taxes apply particularly to investment income from the private sector of our economy. Anyone can readily secure a yield of 3 percent through the purchase of tax-exempt bonds which finance State and local enterprises of many kinds.

An investment in a corporate enterprise must produce at least 7.8 percent before taxes to provide an equivalent yield to a person with a taxable income of only $2,000. If the income of an individual is $10,000 the yield from a private corporate venture must exceed 10 percent before taxes to equal the 3-percent yield he can obtain from a tax-exempt security. If he happens to be in the top Federal tax bracket the equivalent yield from a private corporate investment must be more than 69 percent. This is an absurdity.

"I do not have to belabor the point with this audience that there are few individuals in the upper-income brackets who are interested in financing new risk enterprises under such conditions. I hope, as a member of the Senate Finance Committee, to make a contribution toward the restoration of some sense to this utterly unrealistic progressive tax structure which was designed to punish success rather than to raise revenue. Mr. Khrushchev would not have made this mistake.

"American citizens are not permitted to convert paper dollars into gold; however, foreigners have this opportunity. In recent years we have been providing them with dollar resources to enable them to draw on our gold balances. Unless we maintain competitive prices in world markets and bring about a balance in terms of our international payments our economy is headed for serious trouble.

"In 1949 U.S. gold stocks reached a postwar high of $24.6 billion. At the end of last year they stood at $20.6 billion, a decline of $4 billion. The reduction in 1958 alone totaled $2.3 billion. In fact, the monthly figures show a falling gold stock for every month since January 1958. While a $20 billion gold stock provides an adequate base for our currency, it must be self-evident that a decline of about 10 percent a year can no longer continue without completely destroying our own economic system. This, perhaps, is the best way for us to fully appreciate the impact of unsound economic policies, since an excess of demands for dollar payments abroad over purchases from us will sooner or later be reflected in our monetary reserves.

"Our country has faced and met great problems in the past. I have every confidence that our leaders in industry, labor, and Government are capable of meeting the difficulties which confront us today. They can, and will be met by a rededication by each of us to those ideals which guided our Founding Fathers in writing the Constitution and our Bill of Rights.

"We must reinstill these virtues in our youth, because it is quite apparent that our opponents behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains are developing the willingness to sacrifice immediate pleasures in order to achieve their objectives. We must meet this challenge while retaining freedom. It is more difficult for us to impose self-discipline upon ourselves than to permit dictation by the state, but if we are true to our heritage, this is what we shall do.

NOTE.—All data from July 1958 Fortune "Directory of the 500 Largest U.S. Industrial Corporations" except U.S. income taxes, which was taken from Moody's 1958 "Industrial Manual." Western Electric, which ranked No. 11, was omitted, as its data are consolidated with American Telephone & Telegraph, a public utility. Armour, which ranked No. 16, was omitted since it paid no Federal income taxes.

Fortune magazine in its July 1958 issue ranked America's leading industrial corporations in terms of their sales. On the basis of this list, I find that the taxes paid in 1957 by 44 of our largest industrial corporations do not equal $4 billion. In fact, they paid taxes to the Federal Government in the amount of $3,811 million. These taxes in turn were predicated on sales of $91 billion worth of products. The production of these goods required the use of assets costing $73 billion. The production to furnish these taxes required the employment of more than 4 million employees.

I have prepared a table which shows the actual budget expenditures and receipts in 1957, which is the latest year that figures are available, showing the breakdown of individual personal income tax receipts by the various brackets, which is as follows:

TABLE I.—1957 Federal spending and receipts

EXPENDITURES

	Dollars (billions)	Percent of total
Interest	7.3	10.5
General government	1.8	2.6
Major national security	43.3	62.4
International affairs and finance	2.0	2.9
Veterans' services and benefits	4.8	6.9
Agriculture	4.5	6.5
Labor and welfare	3.0	4.3
Commerce and housing	1.4	2.0
Natural resources	1.3	1.9

RECEIPTS

Corporation income tax	21.2	30.4
Excise and miscellaneous taxes	14.2	20.4
Individual income tax:
$100,000 to $1,000,000 and over	1.9	2.7
$50,000 to $100,000	2.2	3.2
$25,000 to $50,000	3.1	4.4
$15,000 to $25,000	2.7	3.9
$10,000 to $15,000	3.9	5.6
$9,000 to $10,000	1.7	2.4
$8,000 to $9,000	2.2	3.2
$7,000 to $8,000	2.8	4.0
$6,000 to $7,000	3.3	4.7
$5,000 to $6,000	3.4	4.9
$4,000 to $5,000	3.2	4.6
$3,000 to $4,000	2.2	3.2
Under $3,000	1.7	2.4

NOTE.—Of the $35,000,000,000 derived from the personal income tax, $28,000,000,000 (or 80 percent of the total) was in the personal income tax brackets under $25,000.

On the expenditure side I have listed the items in terms of priority. Interest payments must be met if the Government is to remain solvent. General Government expenditures are shown next; major national security is our next order of priority; international affairs and finance come next; followed by veterans' services and benefits. Then I have considered other domestic programs in their order of interest to the Congress, such as agriculture and agricultural resources, labor and welfare, commerce and housing, and natural resources.

On the receipt side I have listed the income by source in the following order: First, there is income from corporation income taxes; then excise taxes; followed by estate, gift, customs, and miscellaneous taxes; and then the receipts from the personal income taxes, which I have shown in terms of income tax brackets. This table, Mr. President, reveals some startling facts. If we take the first four expenditure items—namely, interest payments, general Government expenses, major national security programs, and international affairs and finance expenditures in the year 1957—we find that they preempted all of the receipts from the corporate income tax, all the excise, estate, and gift taxes, customs and miscellaneous receipts, as well as the receipts from personal individual income taxes down to the $7,000 to $8,000 brackets. By adding the next two priorities of budget expenditures—veterans' services and benefits and agriculture and agricultural resources—we then find the Congress has authorized the use of the receipts from all corporate income taxes, excise, estate, and gift taxes, customs, and miscellaneous receipts, as well as the payments to the Federal Government through personal income taxes down to the $5,000 bracket. Expenditures for labor and welfare, commerce and housing, and natural resources were paid for by taxes received from those citizens with taxable incomes of less than $5,000.

I have prepared two additional tables, as follows:

Corporation income tax:
Normal tax: 30 percent of taxable income.
Surtax: 22 percent of taxable income in excess of $25,000.

Transportation of persons-------do--	10
Gasoline----------cents per gallon--	4

On estates in excess of this amount Federal taxes are levied with certain credits for State taxes, as follows:

(A) Taxable estate equal to or more than—	(B) Taxable estate less than—	(C) Tax on amount in col. (A)	(D) Rate of tax on excess over amount in col. (A)

Over $120,000 but not over $140,000.	$68,640, plus 78 percent of excess over $120,000.
Over $140,000 but not over $160,000.	$84,240, plus 81 percent of excess over $140,000.
Over $160,000 but not over $180,000.	$100,440, plus 84 percent of excess over $160,000.
Over $180,000 but not over $200,000.	$117,240, plus 87 percent of excess over $180,000.
Over $200,000 but not over $300,000.	$134,640, plus 89 percent of excess over $200,000.
Over $300,000 but not over $400,000.	$223,640, plus 90 percent of excess over $300,000.
Over $400,000------	$313,640, plus 91 percent of excess over $400,000.

Table II summarizes the present rate of taxes other than personal income taxes. Table III, which shows the tax rates on personal income, is conservative as it is based on a married taxpayer filing a joint return. Under this schedule the 50 percent tax rate is reached with a taxable income of $32,000 whereas a single person is in the 50 percent bracket with a taxable income of only $16,000.

Table III shows that personal income taxes have already reached a level of 91 percent in the top bracket and that even the first $4,000 of taxable income for a married couple carries a rate of 20 percent. In this connection, may I remind my colleagues that social security taxes must also be paid on the first $4,000 at the rate of 3 percent. This payment is not a deduction in the computation of personal income taxes.

OF
HON. D. R. (BILLY) MATTHEWS
OF FLORIDA
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Speaker, on August 29, 1959, a devoted patriot and longtime resident of my congressional district died and was subsequently laid to rest in Arlington National Cemetery. I refer to the late Maj. Garland Wheeler Powell. It seems fitting to pay tribute to his memory, as a new Independence Day draws near, for a unique and patriotic service rendered, not generally known and never appropriately acknowledged.

Garland Wheeler Powell was born in Allegany County, Md., on August 8, 1892. He attended the public schools of his native State and graduated from the University of Maryland. He served a term in the Maryland Legislature.

Garland Powell enlisted in the armed services of the Nation on June 5, 1917, and witnessed battle action as commander of the 22d U.S. Aerial Squadron. He was promoted to the rank of 1st lieutenant on September 13, 1917, and to captain February 19, 1918, later attaining the rank of major in the Reserves.

After the armistice in November 1918, Powell became very active in the early work of the American Legion and was for a number of years a member of the Legion's Americanism committee. In this capacity he was helpful if not wholly instrumental in bringing into existence a U.S. flag code.

Major Powell never laid claim to being the "father" of the flag code, but acknowledged the idea originated with him and the late Gridley Adams. The latter became founder and director-general of the U.S. Flag Foundation, Inc. Adams and Powell presented their idea before the First National Flag Conference held in Washington, June 14–15, 1923, which conference was addressed by the late President Warren G. Harding, who supported the idea of a national flag code enthusiastically.

These two gentlemen in effect laid the groundwork for the later enactment of Public Law 623, approved June 22, 1942, "to codify and emphasize existing rules and customs pertaining to the display and use of the flag of the United States of America," and the eventual passage of Public Law 829 which firmly established the use of the flag of the United States of America by civilians, civilian groups, and organizations.

In the files of the late Mr. Adams may be found a letter from his colleague, Garland Powell, reading, in part, as follows:

> Of course, Gridley, you and I are ultra-patriots and we realize that over the years millions of lives have been sacrificed in the defense of that flag. In my estimation, if schoolchildren could be taught that, our whole Nation would be better off. After all, the school is the place to start the children of the Nation along the path of understanding. That is said even in view of the importance of the church and the home. If the schoolchildren of today are taught respect for their flag, as the parents of tomorrow they will see to it that the home will be taken care of as well as the church. So, my friend, you and I have contributed something that should go down in history as a contribution to this great Nation of ours.

This was an intimate letter from one friend to another and not meant for the public eye. However, it is so appropriate to the subject and to the need of a renewal of patriotic fervor such as Garland Powell exemplified in his life and actions that I think it bears reading. Maj. Garland Powell, indeed, had a reverence for his Nation and its flag which might well be emulated by all of us.

OF
HON. ADAM C. POWELL
OF NEW YORK
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the independence of the Philippines the 4th of July, I wish to extend my warmest congratulations and best wishes to His Excellency, the President, Mr. Carlos P. Garcia, His Excellency the Ambassador, Mr. Carlos Romulo, and all the people of the Philippines.

Perhaps the most significant, modern feature the Philippines has so characteristically unfolded to the world is her recent attainment as the site for the first World Tourist Conference in Asia and the Pacific Area. Already quite renowned in travel lore as the "Pearl of the Orient," the Philippines have contributed immeasurably toward the drive to advance the cause of peaceful progress.

Advancing steadily into the climb of the jet age, as seen in the amalgam of her architecture, traditions, mores, and art, not to mention those intangibles in her national life that has made her nation the first in Asia to emerge from colonialism to independence after the Second World War, she has humbly accepted the best from other cultures to embellish her own nation, molding and enriching the Philippines she is today.

Nurturing her wounds suffered from the ravages of war, the Philippines have risen above her shortcomings and is counted today as one of the robust working democracies in the community of the free world. Formerly crippled, today she now stands firmly under the inspiring leadership of President Carlos P. Garcia, with her own government attending her own problems to secure her people with the maximum internal stability and prosperity.

She has lifted the veil of the mystic East to swing open her doors of hospitality to correct the deeply rooted traditions and fears inspired by ideological conflicts and political antagonisms.

A beacon, indeed, to world peace, the Philippines are certainly to be congratulated on this memorable day of their independence.

Upton, Mass., Celebrates 225th Anniversary

OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, the year 1960 will long be remembered by several communities in my district because it is the year when outstanding programs of events were held to mark noteworthy anniversary dates.

A short time ago the city of Marlboro, Mass., conducted impressive exercises to celebrate its 300th anniversary and I was privileged and pleased to be able to attend some of these events. Earlier this week, it was a distinct honor for me to direct the attention of the House to the 175th anniversary celebration of the city of Gardner, Mass. When the Congress reconvenes next month, I will address the House on the 300th anniversary of the settlement of the Quaboag Plantation which will be celebrated during September 16, 17, 18 by the towns of East Brookfield, Brookfield, North Brookfield, West Brookfield, Warren, and New Braintree, all in my district. These towns were formed from the original settlement known as the Quaboag Plantation.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am proud indeed to bring to the attention of the House the 225th anniversary of the town of Upton, Mass., which will be the subject of a community celebration during the approaching July 4 holiday weekend. While Upton was incorporated as a town in 1735, its history goes back to the very earliest days of American history since it is located in an area where King Philip's War began in 1675 with an Indian raid against a small settlement.

Some researchers say that Upton's history perhaps goes back to even earlier times. A stone cave or hut discovered some years ago in Upton is described as being similar to huts found in Ireland of sixth century Pictic origin. Iceland has similar huts and some investigators have stated that the hut possibly may have been constructed by Norsemen since the Indian tribes in the area were unskilled in masonry.

Many descendants of the original band of early settlers still reside in Upton which comprises some 21 square miles in area with a population of about 3,100. The town was formed from the nearby towns of Mendon, Uxbridge, Sutton, and Hopkinton.

Settlement of the Upton region began in 1717 when Capt. Ebenezer Wood and his family carved a home in the wilderness. Soon former Essex County neighbors and friends joined him and a small community sprung up. The settlement grew slowly because the times were troubled. The constant threat of Indian wars and actual fighting between ominous periods of peace did little to encourage the growth of frontier settlements, but despite all these hazards Upton continued to progress to the point where, by 1730 the settlers felt that a new town should be formed.

The residents were finally successful in their efforts to form a new town on June 25, 1735, and the first town meeting was held on July 28, 1735, in the Sadler homestead which still stands today.

Mr. Speaker, this coming weekend the community of Upton will conduct simple but impressive exercises to mark the town's 225th anniversary. Townspeople will note the progress of 225 years in recalling the accomplishments and deeds of the courageous early settlers. Under the direction of General Chairman Clarence A. Lamson, a devoted anniversary committee has contributed time and effort to work out a memorable community celebration in observance of Upton's 225th anniversary.

The 3-day anniversary celebration opens this Saturday with a bicycle and doll carriage parade, an event which should awaken nostalgic memories among the many who participated in similar enjoyable exercises in past years.

Later in the day the Upton Little League will play the town's bearded men who formed earlier this year the Niagara Bush Association in anticipation of the anniversary celebration. The association is made up of Upton citizens with beards of various sizes and shapes especially grown for the anniversary activities.

Rounding out the day's events will be old fashioned New England bean suppers conducted by individual churches where old and new friends will meet to relive the days and joys of yesterday.

The program of events for Sunday features a pageant of Upton's history in the afternoon, a Little League baseball game, and at night the familiar holiday band concert of yesteryear.

On Monday, the anniversary committee is featuring an old fashioned July 4 parade, complete with floats. A firemen's muster and an anniversary dance in Town Hall are other highlights of the day's events.

The Upton anniversary program, which has been planned for the entertainment of the townspeople and the many visitors from neighboring communities, is truly impressive. One particular aspect of the program, Mr. Speaker, should be signaled out for special mention: it is a simple and dignified program which might well be a duplicate of the programs held to celebrate Upton's 100th or 150th anniversaries—and those are memorable celebrations which can be relived in Upton this weekend.

Mr. Speaker, in recognition of Upton's 225th anniversary celebration, I am introducing today a special resolution extending the greetings and felicitations of the House to Upton on the occasion of this anniversary. I know that my colleagues will be pleased to join with me in paying well deserved tribute to this progressive community in my district and its people who have contributed so much down through the years to the growth and advancement of our great country.

The text of my resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the year 1960 marks the 225th anniversary of the incorporation of the town of Upton, Massachusetts; and

Whereas from the time of settlement in 1728 the people of Upton have figured conspicuously in the founding and growth of this Nation; and

Whereas the observances of the 225th anniversary of Upton is being celebrated with impressive community ceremonies which will attract many visitors to central Massachusetts; and

Whereas Upton is a progressive community rich in historic interest, distinguished for its fervent civic spirit, and faithfully devoted to American institutions and ideals: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives extends its greetings and felicitations to the people of Upton, Massachusetts, on the occasion of the 225th anniversary of this community and the House of Representatives further expresses its appreciation for the splendid services rendered to the Nation by the citizens of Upton during the past 225 years.

Duties and Responsibilities of a U.S. Representative

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been noticing the development of a trend which, I believe, bodes well for our country. If my constituents are representative of the Nation as a whole, and I believe they are, more and more of our citizens are evidencing an increasing awareness of and interest in our Government and how it operates. In ever greater numbers, they are coming to the Nation's Capital to visit our historic shrines and to see the Congress of the United States in action. I personally have had, this year, a record number of visits by my constituents who decided to spend their vacations in Washington and learn more about the Federal Government. The questions they have been asking reflect their keen interest in national affairs. So long as our citizens maintain this interest in the operation of our Government, our Nation will be secure from the forces that threaten to destroy it.

One of the chief questions that my visitors have been asking is just what does a Representative do and what qualifies a man for this important position. To answer, I should like to set forth, in brief, some of my thoughts on the subject.

It is difficult, I am sure, for someone who has not served in the House of Representatives to understand how diverse and complex is the work of a Member of Congress, and how much more than just voting on bills is involved.

The duties and responsibilities of a Representative fall, I believe, into two general categories, one, a legislative function, and the other a service function.

Since most legislation considered by the full House of Representatives is written in its final form by the various committees of the House, a major portion of a Representative's time and efforts are devoted to the subject matter with which his committee deals.

In my own case, for example, I am a member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, so many of my bills and much of my work are devoted to matters dealing with the Federal Government and its employees. Because of my seniority on the committee I have additional responsibilities as chairman of the Subcommittee on Census and Government Statistics which has broad responsibilities involving all the work the Federal Government does in collecting information from the public, processing it, and using it, and the impact of such work on the public. Such subcommittee work adds a great deal to the demands on a Representative's time.

The fact that a Member is assigned to a specific committee does not, of course, keep him from taking an active interest in the writing and enactment of other types of legislation. It should be noted, however, that major legislation usually carries the name of the chairman or a high-ranking member of the committee from which it is reported. A Member who is interested in legislation which is being considered by another committee may appear formally to give his views or he may discuss the matter informally with members of the committee.

When a bill is reported from a committee and scheduled for debate and vote by the full House of Representatives, a Member will read the committee's report to acquaint himself with the background of the legislation and then, taking into account his constituents' feelings about the subject, will decide upon whether to vote for or against the measure.

The average day for a Representative starts at an early hour. He will first go to his office to review the mail and dictate replies before he goes to his committee meeting which is usually scheduled at 10 o'clock. He may remain in the meeting until noon when the House convenes. Depending on what is scheduled for debate, he may remain in the House Chamber all afternoon, or he may return to his office to do the other part of his work, that of performing a multitude of services for his individual constituents or the communities in his district. He may consult with officials of the Federal agencies on housing problems, on veteran or immigration cases, on tax matters, on a public works project vital to the economic welfare of his district. It is almost an impossibility to make a complete listing of the special problems which he is called upon to help solve. He must, in addition, compose speeches and statements on subjects in which he is interested, and do research on legislative matters.

The Honorable Champ Clark, a great Speaker of the House of Representatives, gave a memorable speech on a Congressman's necessary qualifications for success and the importance and power of seniority in Congress. He said:

No man is a born Congressman. He must learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor. He must be a man of at least fair capacity, honest, industrious, energetic, courageous, and sober. His usefulness and influence are made by experience and practice. * * * If he has those qualifications and diligently exercises them, his honor, influence, and usefulness to his country and his constituents increases in gometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion with each of his additional terms in Congress. A man should be elected to the House for the good of the country, and never just to gratify his ambition.

He urged all congressional districts to select a man of those qualifications and then keep him in Congress as long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps amazingly in doing things.

I hope that this brief statement of mine will help our citizens understand a little more clearly the duties and responsibilities of a U.S. Representative.

Czechoslovakia Bars U.S. "Masaryk" Stamp

OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as we know, the Post Office Department annually issues special stamps depicting in minature famous men and women, great events in history, organizations, industries and natural wonders.

In addition, the Department issues a special series "champions of liberty" stamps. The purpose of this series is to honor foreign leaders and fighters of freedom.

Recently, a special stamp was issued to honor Thomas G. Masaryk, the founder-president of the Republic of Czechoslovakia in October 1918.

As we know, Czechoslovakia is now under Communist domination.

Traditionally, the Communists have changed or distored history to put communism in a better light insofar as possible.

Following the issuance of the special stamp honoring Thomas G. Masaryk as a champion of liberty for Czechoslovakia, the Czechoslovakian Government took action to bar mail bearing this stamp from that country.

The action reflects an unwillingness to allow even a postage stamp depicting freedom fighters of the past to circulate among the people. In addition, it calls to mind the old adage which, in essence, says, "Uneasy rests the head of a dictator who has denied freedom to his people." At this time, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two items: First, an editorial from the Green Bay Press Gazette entitled "Champion of Liberty," reviewing the action and its significance by the Czech Communist government and; second, a release by Postmaster Arthur E. Summerfield deploring the action barring the mailing of champion of liberty stamps to people in Czechoslovakia.

There being no objection, the editorial and release were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Green Bay Press Gazette]
CHAMPION OF LIBERTY

When postage of one country is not acceptable to another, the latter is supposed to so notify the nation of origin under the Universal Postal Agreement. But authorities in Czechoslovakia so far have been shy about doing so. They simply send back undelivered letters from the United States which bear the stamp honoring Thomas G. Masaryk.

Masaryk, the president of the Czechoslovakian Republic from its start in 1918 until 1935 when it only had a few years to go to be dissolved, is honored in the "Champions of Liberty" commemorative series. When the stamp was issued, Postmaster General Arthur Summerfield said: "These stamps * * * will mark not only the strong friendship between the peoples but their common aspirations for freedom."

But since the end of World War II, the adoption of a new constitution and the taking over of the entire nation by the Communists, the Czechs have shown little aspiration for freedom. Of all the Russian satellites, Czechoslovakia is supposed to be the most communized. If there are underground movements, there is little rumble of them in the rest of the world. From the outside it appears that the freedom-loving Czechs, so determined in opposing the oppressive Nazi rule and the slicing up of their country at Munich, have been worn down by the years of war and oppression.

But the very fact that the Czech government has made no loud noise about Masaryk indicates that there must be a lot of people in the nation who do him honor and the cause for which he lived and died. A people who have lived with liberty do not forget so easily.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT RELEASE NO. 193

Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield today deplored the action taken by the Czechoslovakia Government in barring mail bearing U.S. "champion of liberty" stamps honoring Thomas G. Masaryk, the father of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia.

"On March 7, 1960, the U.S. Government issued two new postage stamps of the 4-cent and 8-cent denominations honoring Thomas G. Masaryk, the founder-President of the Republic of Czechoslovakia in October 1918," Mr. Summerfield said. "These stamps are part of a series paying tribute to the great contributions to freedom made by great foreign-born leaders.

"An impressive ceremony was held here in Washington on that date with large numbers of American citizens of Czechoslovakian birth or ancestry in attendance. Many of these freedom-loving Americans used these new Masaryk stamps for mail addressed to their friends and relatives in Czechoslovakia.

"To our amazement we were informed that mail bearing the Masaryk stamp was being delivered in Czechoslovakia with the Masaryk stamps removed and envelopes marked 'received without stamps.' We protested this practice but received no reply from the Czechoslovakia postal authorities. Later they began returning such mail marked 'not admitted.'

"The procedure being followed by Czechoslovakia is used when international mail is received which is objectionable to the country of destination. The Universal Postal Convention, to which the United States and Czechoslovakia are signatories, prescribes that each member country of the union has the right to determine what articles shall be prohibited in its service, and there is no effective way in which another country can take exception to such determination.

"When a nation establishes a prohibition, it normally notifies the other country or countries from which the objectionable matter is being sent. The Czech postal authorities failed to follow this universally accepted obligation.

"Our efforts to correct this situation date back to May 10, when we wrote the Czech postal authorities protesting the removal of the Masaryk stamp from letters.

"Then, on June 8, we cabled them again to protest the removal of the stamps. And, in the same cable, we also asked them for an official explanation of the many complaints which we had received meanwhile protesting their return of letters with the Masaryk stamp marked 'not admitted.'

"It is clear that we have made substantial efforts to get satisfaction from the Czech postal authorities. While they are technically within their legal rights in determining what mail may enter their territory, it is deplorable that they should bar communications from this country to loved ones in Czechoslovakia because of stamps honoring a brilliant scholar, author, and patriot who fought with the powerful weapons of ideas, logic and eloquence, and who won the admiration and active support of freedom-loving peoples everywhere."

Federal Employees Pay Raise Legislation

OF
HON. RICHARD E. LANKFORD
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to comment on the President's recent veto message and the action taken by the House today in overriding the veto.

I am deeply gratified by the size of the vote and I am sure the American people will know by this showing that 344 Members of the House would not have taken such action if, as the President states, this bill "violates every concept of fairness, every rule of reason and logic."

Fully recognizing the President's right to take such action, I nevertheless cannot stand silent and read a statement that is as unfair to Federal employees as this one is. The President has been quoted as being shocked by lobbying tactics utilized in recent weeks to insure passage of a pay raise bill. I, for one, am shocked, and I think that I am joined in this feeling by virtually every Member of this body, by the President's use of such language. Yes, I have been urged to support H.R. 9883. Classified employees and postal workers have urged me to support this bill on the grounds that it is desperately needed in order for them to cope with today's ever-increasing cost of living. It appears strange to me that the President is singling out representatives of Federal employees' unions for strong criticism, while remaining silent for 7 years on the tactics utilized by the National Association of Manufacturers, the chamber of commerce, and hosts of paid lobbyist-attorneys from downtown Washington. In past Congresses we have even had Cabinet members present in the Speaker's lobby using every known pressure tactic to influence the will of this body.

The postal workers and classified Federal employees were not paid to visit me. In fact, many of these employees had to take time off, without pay in some instances, to ask their Representative to support legislation for their benefit. In recent days, an absurd complaint has been lodged against Mr. William C. Doherty, president of the National Association of Letter Carriers, concerning possible violation of the Hatch Act. Mr. Doherty for many years has gained the widest possible admiration and respect for his untiring efforts on behalf of the Letter Carriers Association and is recognized by one and all as one of America's outstanding citizens. It is deplorable to me that this personal attack has been instigated against him. With well over 250,000 Federal employes in the Washington metropolitan area, I am proud to stand as their spokesman and to insist on fair and equitable treatment.

Whenever I read the President's veto message on Federal pay legislation, and this is the third time I have read such a message, I wonder who in the world advises the President of the United States to take such a position against his own employees. In the 6 years I have been privileged to represent the Fifth District of Maryland, from my own personal knowledge I have seen many Federal employees' families where the breadwinner is forced to take two and often three jobs and the wife is required to work just in order to make ends meet. The President tells us that the consumer's price index has advanced only 2.1 percent since the last pay increase was enacted. I have no doubt that the President's figures, as supplied by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, are correct. But this is completely beside the point. Congress has always lagged behind in granting Federal employees their wage increases. When this raise is granted, as a class they will still not be brought up to the average wage outside the Federal Government. Regardless of whether the cost of living has gone up 2 or 3 percent since the last raise, they started with an inequitable wage balance to begin with.

At this point, I would like to include in the RECORD a table of statistics prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics completely substantiating this point. It is inexcusable that the President did not study this chart before making his 2.1-percent statement, in an obvious attempt to mislead the American public.

Once again, this administration recommends that pay action be deferred pending still another survey. No one suggested a survey when the administration, with alarming speed, negotiated a steel settlement with the cost to the American public deferred until after the general election. The Vice President has remained strangely silent where the welfare of Federal employees is concerned.

The executive branch recognizes that there are inequities existing in the present Federal employees pay scale. I have no quarrel with this. I have long recognized this. An attempt was made by some of us in this Congress to focus attention on these inequities by the introduction of legislation designed to eliminate many of them. The administration failed to cooperate and to support a long-overdue adjustment in today's hodgepodge pay scale system. Are we to punish the Government's own employees because this administration for almost 8 years has failed to recommend to Congress a plan whereby this long-overdue adjustment could be realized?

The House today, by its vote, has obviously answered this question in the negative.

I supported such a study, as recommended, and introduced legislation 2 years ago to provide for such a study. We have had studies in recent times and what has been the result? The Cordiner Committee, appointed by the President, in 1957 allegedly studied the rates of pay of all individuals employed by the Federal Government. No implementing action has been requested. And what did the O'Connell Committee have to say? I quote: "Salaries fixed by statutes have not been adjusted in a timely and adequate manner in response to general changes in non-Federal salary levels."

The President has seen fit to criticize Congress for not awaiting the results of a national salary survey being made by the Department of Labor. I see absolutely no reason for awaiting a compilation of figures from every rural nook and cranny of the United States when the clear facts on the record demonstrate that Federal employees in the Washington metropolitan area, one of the highest cost-of-living areas in the United States, are not being treated fairly by their employer, the Federal Government.

I commend the House for its action today and let there be no mistake about it, I invite all of my constituents to continue to advise me of their feelings on pending legislation, even though their doing so appears to be distasteful to the President. It is a constitutional right of which neither this nor any other President can deprive them.

New Republic of Somalia

OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a moment to pay tribute to Italian Somalia which today, July 1, becomes independent Somalia.

This nation was once an Italian colony, which the Italian Government voluntarily turned over to the United Nations in 1950. Somalia then became an Italian trusteeship.

During the past decade Italy has taken full responsibility for preparing the Somali people for free and independent status. Under Italy's guidance, Somalia has made considerable progress, both economically and in developing political maturity. Italy has taken her obligations under the U.N. mandate very seriously, and has vigorously applied herself to the task of leading Somalia toward full partnership in the community of nations.

The hopes and aspirations of the Somali people reach fulfillment today with the proclamation of the Somali Republic. We wish them well on this momentous occasion, and we hope they will achieve a full measure of prosperity and success.

Address by the Honorable Kenneth B. Keating, Senator From New York, to the Graduating Class of Albany Law School, Albany, N.Y., on June 7, 1960

OF
HON. DEAN P. TAYLOR
OF NEW YORK
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. TAYLOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, Senator KEATING recently delivered a commencement address to the graduating class of the Albany Law School, my alma mater, Albany, N.Y. On this occasion he was the recipient of an honorary doctor of laws degree from the university.

In his excellent address he urged law schools to assume a more vigorous role in shaping the course of the law. He also, in stirring words, appealed to the young men of the graduating class to approach the practice of law with a full awareness that lawyers are a vital part of our democracy whose function is to serve the public good always.

Mr. Speaker, I know that Senator KEATING'S erudite remarks will be of interest to many Members, and under leave previously granted I insert them in the RECORD:

Commencement is a most appropriate designation for the day of graduation. This is the beginning; the beginning of a new stage in your careers.

On such an occasion, it is useful to look back as well as ahead. In planning our goals and objectives, it is helpful to consider our present bearings before charting our next step in life.

Justice Holmes once remarked that a law school does not undertake to teach success. In his words: "That combination of tact and skill which gives a man immediate prominence among his fellows comes from nature, not from instruction."

Perhaps this was an overstatement. A great law school does more for a student than fill his mind with unending legal data. It teaches him to understand the law as a tool for preserving society. It teaches him to respect the law as a safeguard against oppression and arbitrariness. It teaches him to apply the law as an instrument for social and political progress.

It teaches him to relate the law to other professions and disciplines which serve the public good. It teaches him to revere the law as one of the principal guardians of liberty and morality.

This kind of education affects our natures just as an understanding of art affects our appreciation of great paintings. I know that after 3 years of legal training and after you have passed a bar exam—which I am sure will be a mere formality for most of you—you will feel very learned in the law and will be absolutely certain of a great number of legal doctrines.

It has been said that the young lawyer has three cardinal virtues: faith, hope, and charity—faith in his own infinite knowledge, hope for the obtuseness of judges and juries, and charity for the older lawyers who have all the business; and that the greatest of these virtues is faith.

I am sure that most of you realize that you are just at the threshold of the study of law—but if you don't, the sooner you are enlightened the better.

Law is a process, not a thing. It is constantly growing in depth and scope in the manner of a living organism not an inanimate object.

It must be stable, but it cannot stand still if it is to serve its eternal purpose. For the law must adapt to its environment and adjust to the needs it fulfills, just as a person must, to survive and thrive.

That is why the study of law is a never-ending pursuit. It is a pursuit which will enrich your lives and ennoble your spirits. No one who understands the never-ending growth of the law ever expects to be its master. But anyone who dedicates himself to its study will achieve a more splendid character, a wiser outlook, and a better nature for his efforts.

The growth of the law and the dedicated lawyer go hand in hand.

Unfortunately this is not the picture all practicing lawyers present. Some members of the bar understand law only as a profitable business, and are oblivious to their obligations and opportunities as members of a great profession. These lawyers betray a great tradition. They renounce—often unwittingly—a valuable inheritance. No matter how many continuing legal education courses they sign up for, they will never be educated lawyers. The gap in their understanding of the mission and purpose of the law will remain permanently unfilled.

Sometimes these lawyers present a tempting example to the fledgling practitioner. Their lack of dedication does not seem to affect their ability to acquire rich and even important clients. They frequently achieve material opulence despite the absence of any spiritual substance in their makeup. It is a sad fact that some clients actually admire these lawyers just because they are cunning and calculating.

The important measure of a lawyer, however, is not made by his clients but by his brothers at the bar. There is no greater satisfaction to a lawyer than the respect of his colleagues. The recognition you receive from your brethren will be infinitely more rewarding to you when the time comes to look back upon your careers than any superficial praise you receive from a client who gets something through your efforts to which he is entitled or sometimes is not entitled.

In the words of Theodore Roosevelt, therefore, I urge you to eschew the life of "ignoble ease" in favor of the "strenuous life"—the life of toil and effort, of labor and strife.

I counsel you, as he did his countrymen, that "the highest form of success * * * comes not to a man who desires mere easy peace but to the man who does not shrink from danger, from hardship, or from bitter toil, and who out of these wins the splendid ultimate triumph."

If you are imbued with this spirit, I welcome you to the profession of the law. I predict a rewarding and a challenging life for you. I know that America needs your services. I am grateful for whatever circumstances have led you to the practice of law.

If you do not possess this nature, then I implore you to give up this ambition. We already have enough lawyers of shallow character. Find some other outlet for your interests—do not further corrupt our profession.

I hope there is none in this group who has failed to grasp the noble mission of the law. But if there are such opportunists here who seek to use the training they have received only for material gain, I want to do my best to discourage them from ever completing the transition from law student to lawyer.

They should know that law is one of the most crowded professions in this country. According to the 1958 lawyers' census conducted by Martindale-Hubbell, Inc., there were over a quarter of a million lawyers admitted to practice. Department of Commerce figures indicate that over 35,000 lawyers are right here in New York, which is more than twice the number in any other State. There are more lawyers in the United States than dentists, bookkeepers, or real estate agents. There are even more lawyers than clergymen, which certainly is something to ponder.

These figures should not discourage the worthy among you, which I am sure, having had considerable experience with Albany Law School graduates, includes every member of this graduating class. The profession may suffer from having too many lawyers, but never from having too many good lawyers.

My sincere conviction is that the legal profession still has a tremendous untapped potential for service. Too many people fail to consult lawyers until they are past the point of counsel and need only a stanch advocate to rescue them. I believe that a proper educational program would induce many more citizens to seek the advice of counsel before they have taken an irrevocable and unwise step. We have not developed preventive law at anywhere near the level of preventive medicine, for example.

There is also a great demand for lawyers in the Government service. There are more lawyers in Government service today than total graduates from this law school in its more than 100 years of existence. The increasing scope of Federal regulation and the constantly expanding activity of all levels of Government promise to keep the demand for lawyers for Government at a high level.

All that I have indicated about the attitude of lawyers in private practice applies to an even greater degree to lawyers entering Government service. Such lawyers assume in addition to the general obligations of all members of the bar to the public the special obligations of the public servant to the public. A lawyer in Government who does not live up to the highest ethics of his profession can do irreparable harm by destroying public confidence in the Government itself.

There also is a growing demand for law teachers. I hope that such a career will appeal to the best among you. The law schools of this country can be vital forces for shaping the course of the law. A law teacher enjoys an independence of spirit, a freedom from commitments and a forum for expression which can make him a powerful influence in directing legal developments.

Dean Roscoe Pound long ago recognized the unique opportunity the law schools enjoy of becoming effective instruments for legal reform.

In a speech almost 35 years ago, he said: "In these institutions we may find the permanence of tenure, the conditions of work—continuity, opportunity of dealing with problems as a whole, possibility of surveying a wide field, extending beyond the limitations of jurisdictions and localities and parties—the independence of politics, and the guarantees of training, ability, and scientific attitude, which are essential to effective research and which will command public confidence. * * * In no way may the lawyer be so sure of achieving his task of making straight the paths of American justice, as by doing his part to assure to our law schools the means of carrying on the scientific investigations on which the law reforms of the future must go forward."

I am uncertain whether the law schools have accepted or fulfilled this assignment. I know that individual law professors, including many of this faculty, have made a very significant contribution to the law. But these have been independent efforts, which while nurtured by the associated schools, have usually not been undertaken as part of the task of a law center.

The law schools have been plagued by fund shortages. But I would hope that high on the list of goals of every campaign drive for funds would be that of obtaining the necessary resources for this kind of undertaking. To a large extent, work of the nature I have in mind for the law schools is now being performed by private foundations—but under handicaps and with preconceptions which would not impede similar law school endeavors.

For the law schools ever to perform this function, they will have to have the full support of the alumni whose ranks you are about to join. Do not think of yourself as graduating from this institution in the sense of leaving it. It would be more constructive to think of this day in terms of changing the nature of your relationship to your alma mater. For three of the most important years of your lives you have been taking from it; give some thought now to what you can contribute to it in your new status.

There is no end to the valuable projects which could be undertaken by law schools functioning as law centers. Study of the operations of the Government would be my No. 1 suggestion. It is frequently pointed out that while Congress investigates the other agencies of Government almost without respite, none of the other agencies can investigate the Congress with the same thoroughness.

I have some sympathy with this complaint, and I believe that Congress has not been vigilant enough in keeping its own house in order and attuning its operations to present day demands. A respected and responsible law school, under the proper auspices, could do a superlative job in correcting this legislative oversight.

There is a need also for lawyers in the fields of legal administration. Problems of tremendous scope exist in translating our conceptions of justice into the processes of the law. The courts are desperately understaffed. The regulatory agencies are plagued by conflicting functions, objectives and policies.

Institutes of judicial administration still are relatively new. No agency at all exists for supervising and coordinating the work of the regulatory agencies.

I hope young lawyers will take a special interest in the problems of administering justice. No law is self-executing and even the best intentions can be frustrated by ineffective or inefficient procedures. These problems do not receive the thoughtful attention they deserve. The interrelation between procedural and substantive growth in the law is too often overlooked. In my opinion, this task of keeping the machinery of justice from breaking down is of supreme importance.

These are only some of the paths open to you as young lawyers. I could discuss numerous other branches of the practice with you because, in truth, the variety of endeavors in which a good lawyer can usefully engage is without end. The important thing is not which course you pursue but what purpose you serve.

Whether you are handling a closing in a real estate transaction, safeguarding the rights of a defendant in a criminal case, or organizing a corporation, keep in mind always that you are functioning as a vital part of our democracy, in the tradition of a great profession, with a responsibility to serve the public good always.

There are many stories of young lawyers, but I have always enjoyed the one about the neophyte, who, being unused to the practices of the U.S. Supreme Court, addressed the dignified Justices as "gentlemen" instead of calling them "your honors." He immediately apologized.

Chief Justice Taft, in accordance with his customary attempt to make lawyers who were appearing before the august body feel at ease, replied, "Don't apologize for calling us gentlemen. That is what we try to be."

And gentlemen is what you must be. Be humble without being docile, for you have much to learn but must seek out knowledge. Be studious but not timid, for reflection will reveal the spirit of the law but action is its body. Give yourselves to community causes. Defend the liberty of your fellow men. Take pride in your country. Do not avoid conflict or seek easy success. This great school has prepared you to meet challenges less fortified men must shun.

You are no longer privileged to pursue easy, detached lives. You are part of the inner fabric of society and you must never reject the tasks your fellows will thrust upon you.

Justice Cardozo put it well when he said: "Law is not a cadaver, but a spirit, not a finality, but a process of becoming, not a clog upon the fullness of life, but an outlet and a means thereto, not a game, but a sacrament."

Keep these words always before you. And if you will always act with the understanding that you are part of a sacred mission—I promise you will achieve true success.

As you embark upon your chosen field of endeavor, please, I pray you, do not be haunted by the specter of security. Security is appropriate to old age. It is not the business of you young men who leave Albany Law School today. Cultivate rather the uncertainties of challenge—and make your only security that of knowing that struggle, not repose, is the best reason for living. Indeed, let us express sorrow for any young man who spends his life making the bed in which he will lie in his old age. He arrives at the destination, but he has missed all the scenery.

This day you leave the Albany Law School. But, in a sense, it is not a true departure. It can never be. For as long as you live a part of you will be here—must forever be here—in these halls and rooms you have known and loved. What remains for me to say but Godspeed—and may the lives of each one of you be the proud gifts you bring back one day to offer, as tokens of affection, to the school that your hearts will never leave.

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, because I believe it has timely significance, the text of an address given by my colleague, Representative HAROLD R. COLLIER, of the 10th District of Illinois, at the annual Serbian-American rally held at the Sherman Hotel in Chicago on Sunday, June 26, is inserted for reading by the Members of the House of Representatives:

On this occasion, it is fitting and proper to take you back to the historically eventful morning of March 25, 1941, when, shortly after 10 a.m., news broadcasts and wire services around the world carried word that Yugoslavia had signed a pact with the Axis nations.

At that time the Nazi war machine had rolled through Europe and the Balkan States were to be the inevitable victims of Hitler.

With this word the flame of freedom sputtered as if to die and the nation that had offered some ray of hope in resisting aggression seemed destined to fall.

Yet within this land there were 8 million Serbs who, as the author, Ruth Mitchell, stated in the title of her book published in 1943, "chose war" in preference to the servitude of tyranny.

This comparatively small, freedom-loving populace suffered the perils and the atrocities of this brutal epic in history, with a stubborn courage that is now legendary in World War II, as legendary as the name Mihajlovic.

Certainly it is not necessary for me to dwell upon the conditions under which the Serbs carried on their own war as a guerrilla fighting force, matched against one of the greatest organized armies in history.

I am sure that they will live on as long as the uncompromising desire for liberty and freedom remains in the hearts of Serbian people wherever they may be.

The story of the heroic fight of these people was not new to the Serbian nation, for the history of these people, which dated back so many centuries, was punctuated with a fight for survival.

Yes; we can go back to the year of 850, when the Serbs rose against Byzantium and formed an independent state under King Vlastimar.

Several times the Serbian state fought for its freedom, was conquered, but arose again.

Throughout history, up until the beginning of the 19th century, the Serbian national movement repeatedly gained new impetus.

In 1804 the Serbs first rose against their invaders and joined their Balkan neighbors to gain temporary liberation from the Turks after 400 years of domination.

Serbia was ruled intermittently by two rival dynasties, Obrenovich and Karageorgevich, until 1918. Under their reign, other parts of Old Rashka were liberated.

And so you can readily see, from this, that from 850 to the present time the Serbs have had, in all periods of their history, at least one independent Serbian state governed by the rulers who invariably spring from the people.

And, while Serbia no longer exists as an independent nation today, it certainly provides an object lesson, and perhaps even some encouragement to other freedom-loving human beings of all nationalities who may be today under the heel of totalitarian rule.

Throughout the centuries, the burning desire for freedom and independence has been characteristic of the Serbian people. In fact, their willingness to make any sacrifice to fulfill this desire under any conditions has shaped the course of history in the Balkans. And well it may shape the destiny of freemen in their struggle against oppression in the future.

In today commemorating the historic Battle of Kossovo in 1389 and recalling the epic of King Lazar we must pause and gather the full meaning of the motto of the Serbs at that time—"Golden Liberty and Holy Cross"—for no slogan of freedom-loving men was ever more indelibly written and none has been more lasting. The Serbs of that time knew that no birthright was more golden than liberty—the right of a man to be the master of his own destiny—to breathe as a freeman with the right to worship his God as he pleased. And that slogan must never die as long as there remains those of us who are dedicated to liberty, justice, and devotion of our Creator.

Reviewing, as we are, the story of a great struggle of a nation of people of this dedication, we can only hope and pray that we have learned a deep and lasting lesson from Yalta and Teheran—though certainly we may never be able to alleviate the sad plight of several nations which resulted from the policy of appeasement of tyrants in these historic meetings of the Big Four. May this lesson prevail in any and all future dealings of our heads of state with Communist leaders.

The plight of every captive nation today should be a warning to free nations of the threat which faces them in this great struggle for the minds of man—a struggle that demands vigilance against the threat of godless communism.

For communism, no matter how decentralized it may be, offers no compromise of freedom and certainly not the heritage which has long been our birthright as Americans.

In Yugoslavia today, despite the variation or diversion from the Kremlin hierarchy, there can be no dispute that the Communist Party, built upon the philosophy of Marxism, maintains control over the economy of the country.

And let there be no mistake that the Communist Party is still the only party permitted Marshal Tito in that country.

We know, too, that the party utilizes the national trade union, Sindikat, to control the workers' councils and this group absolutely dominates the worker-management system.

That progress is being made under a Communist system which is allegedly, or at least temporarily, divorced from that of the U.S.S.R. is not to believe that it has anything in common with democracy.

In the past several years, we have seen communism as a way of life make disappointing inroads in many parts of the world.

Only the strength and determination of those who believe in American ideals has maintained the balance which exists today. It is this kind of strength and determination which has sparked this meeting today—and which must never die in the future.

Whether within the framework of decentralized Marxism as it exists in Yugoslavia today there is any ray of hope that the system will ultimately collapse under its own weight and yield to a system devised by freemen is yet problematical.

More important, however, in a broad understanding of communism today, is the Soviet pattern and the tentacles of this economic octopus which are stretching, too often in camouflage, into unsuspecting corners of the world.

Free nations and free people will remain so only as long as they are vigilant of the threat of the Kremlin.

To ignore the fact of Czechoslovakia, and the story of Budapest written in the blood of freedom fighters is sheer folly.

To fail to understand the spy system of the Soviet Union or to minimize it in the face of recent international incidents which embraced the U–2 episode, the summit collapse and the demonstrations in Japan, would be catastrophic thinking on the part of the American, singular or collective, vividly brought home in Cuba and China.

One week and one day from tomorrow, the people of this Nation will celebrate the 183d anniversary of America's independence.

We have engaged in two great wars since the turn of the century to preserve this independence and to make the world safe for democracy.

Yet today we are still engaged in a struggle, one in which the Soviet leaders are employing the threat of might and the cunning of deceit and propaganda to undermine our determination to remain free.

While, perhaps, we are too inclined to accept this blessing of freedom that we have maintained for 184 years, certainly the average Russian must be as bitterly disgusted and weary of world conditions as we are.

For as human beings, created by the will of God, they must resent, though they dare not protest, the menacing shouts that issue from the Kremlin.

And their nerves must be ragged by now because this continuous threat is added to a standard of living far below our own.

Today and every day, and particularly on this coming Independence Day, it would seem that we must rededicate ourselves to keeping intact the freedoms which our forefathers won and so many boys have died to keep.

And remember, too, on this memorable day, how bitterly our ancestors fought to leave a legacy of freedom in a world plagued with a determined move to communize it, we dare not be complacent.

While the world is at the crossroads, I believe that time is running out for the masters of the Kremlin and that time, in other words, is on our side.

If we are patient and determined, and if we are willing to make sacrifices to keep ourselves strong and free here at home, and if we do not allow ourselves to be bluffed into appeasement, we and the millions like us around the world can preserve our own independence and offer the light of hope to those behind the Iron Curtain.

I believe that God has so willed it.

Further Reduction in Tariff Rates Could Sound the Death Knell for Many American Industries

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, American industry is vitally concerned with the hearings to be conducted by the U.S. Tariff Commission beginning July 11, 1960. Many industrial and manufacturing firms fear that further reductions will be made in tariff rates and thus add to the economic woe of basic industries throughout the entire Nation. There is also grave concern over the action that may be taken by the Committee for Reciprocity Information in a further reduction of tariff rates at the conference in Geneva next September. Already many American manufacturers have submitted briefs to both the U.S. Tariff Commission and to the Committee for Reciprocity Information which is an interdepartmental committee of the Tariff Commission.

For the past several years I have repeatedly called the attention of the House of Representatives to the plight of American industries caused by flooding the American marketplace with cheaply manufactured foreign goods that rob American wage earners of their jobs and hence their means of earning a livelihood.

Among my many efforts to curb the uncontrolled importation of foreign goods manufactured at slave labor wages was the introduction on January 21, 1960, of H.R. 9841, a bill designed to adjust conditions of competition between certain domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States. The proposed legislation was drafted in cooperation with Senator KENNETH B. KEATING, Representative of New York, who introduced the bill in the U.S. Senate as S. 2882. It is regretted that it has not been possible during the past 6 months to obtain action by the House Ways and Means Committee on the Keating-Van Zandt version of legislation needed to curb the evil effects of flooding the United States with foreign-made goods manufactured at slave labor wages.

In addition to writing to the Committee for Reciprocity Information regarding the need to delete from the public list many products of our domestic manufacturers that if subjected to a further reduction of tariff rates will result in real chaos, I have also written to the U.S. Tariff Commission concerning the plight of the Rockwell Manufacturing Co., Pittsburgh, Pa., which manufactures several products among which are taximeters and water and gas meters all of which have been adversely affected by the sharp reduction in tariff rates.

Since hearings are scheduled to begin before the U.S. Tariff Commission on July 11 and are expected to continue for 6 weeks, I have written the Commission in support of the views of Ralph K. Ulrich, vice president, Rockwell Register Corp., and sales manager, Register Division, Rockwell Manufacturing Co., Pittsburgh, Pa. Mr. Ulrich submitted a statement on June 27, 1960, to the U.S. Tariff Commission in which he clearly explains the inequitable situation that has resulted from the tariff reduction in 1951 which slashed tariff rates 50 percent on taximeters or parts thereof, finished or unfinished. Mr. Ulrich points out that from the standpoint of the dollar volume, imports increased from $5,848 in 1951 to $38,436 in 1952 and since that time the average annual imports have climbed to over $92,000. Additional statements regarding other products will be filed by the Rockwell Manufacturing Co., in time for the July hearings.

It is significant to state that the production of taximeters is only one of the many products manufactured by the Rockwell Co., which is one of the most highly respected industrial concerns in the Nation. This particular company which operates a modern plant in my congressional district at Du Bois, Pa., made an enviable record during World War II and the Korean conflict through its contribution to the war effort. The firm which employs highly skilled mechanics proved its ability to retool with surprising speed and engage in Government contracts requiring a high degree of precision work.

Mr. Speaker, it is unthinkable that the Federal Government, through ill-conceived reductions in tariff rates, would endanger the future operation of firms like the Rockwell Manufacturing Co., whose reservoir of highly skilled mechanics may well be needed should further national emergencies arise that threaten the security of this Nation. At this point in my remarks I wish to include my letter of July 1, 1960, to Mr. Donn N. Bent, secretary of the U.S. Tariff Commission, together with the statement filed June 27, 1960, by Mr. Ralph K. Ulrich, vice president, Rockwell Register Corp. and sales manager, Register Division, Rockwell Manufacturing Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

It is my fervent hope that both the U.S. Tariff Commission and the Committee for Reciprocity Information will weigh well the factual information being submitted by various American manufacturers against further tariff reductions, because unless the precarious situation confronting American industry is fully recognized and a tendency to reduce tariff rates is curbed the future is bleak for many firms throughout the Nation who find themselves helpless to compete against the inroads being made by cheaply manufactured foreign goods now flooding the American marketplace. The letter and statement referred to in the preceding paragraph follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 1, 1960.

Re Rockwell Manufacturing Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. DONN N. BENT,
Secretary, U.S. Tariff Commission,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: Since Du Bois, Pa., is in my congressional district and the Clearfield-Du Bois area is among the two areas in Blair and Clearfield Counties that have been certified for the past several years as labor surplus areas by the U.S. Department of Labor, a great amount of time and effort has been devoted by me in trying to rehabilitate the economy of that section of Pennsylvania.

My reason in stressing the chronic unemployment problem which continues to plague my congressional district is due to the fact that it is among the labor surplus areas in the Nation frequently referred to by President Eisenhower as "pockets of unemployment" in contrast to a measure of prosperity enjoyed in other areas of the Nation.

It is against the above-described background of unemployment that I write you in support of the plea of the Rockwell Manufacturing Co. with respect to the menacing situation that prevails because of the marked increase since 1951 in the importation of foreign-made taximeters. In this connection, under date of June 17 the Rockwell Manufacturing Co. wrote you and furnished 20 copies of a written statement relative to the Tariff Commission hearings scheduled to begin July 11, 1960. The request was made for permission to appear at the public hearings at which time Mr. Ralph K. Ulrich, vice president, Rockwell Register Corp. and sales manager of the Rockwell Manufacturing Co., would appear as a witness.

The Rockwell Manufacturing Co. has a plant located at Du Bois, Pa., in my congressional district, where it is recognized as one of the key industries in that area. Therefore, I am deeply interested in the plea that no further reduction be made in the existing tariff rate on taximeters.

It is significant to state at this point that since the 1951 reduction of the tariff rate on "taximeters or parts thereof, finished or unfinished," from 85 percent to 42½ percent, the importation of lower priced foreign-made taximeters has increased by leaps and bounds.

For example, the Department of Commerce reveals that following the reduction of the tariff on taximeters by one-half in 1951, a marked increase occurred in the importation of foreign-made taximeters. In 1951, total imports amounted to $5,848; while in 1952 the volume increased to $38,436. It should be emphasized at this point that since 1952, the average annual imports have skyrocketed to $92,000. It is evident that the reduced tariff rate has not only seriously affected the domestic taximeter manufacturer but any further concessions to foreign manufacturers would sound the death knell to the industry in the United States.

I wish to emphasize my grave concern over any attempt to further reduce the tariff rate and to urge that serious consideration be given to the plight of the domestic taximeter industry in the wake of the 1951 tariff reduction which has had adverse effects on firms like the Rockwell Manufacturing Co. It is my considered judgment that the tariff rate should be adjusted upward; otherwise the taximeter industry is facing extinction.

In conclusion, I should like to have this letter made part of the public hearings and at the same time recall to public attention the great part played by the taximeter industry during recent wars when its highly skilled mechanics filled the urgent need for the precision work required in manufacturing war material and equipment which demanded the utmost in skill and dexterity.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. VAN ZANDT.

STATEMENT OF RALPH K. ULRICH, VICE PRESIDENT, ROCKWELL REGISTER CORP., AND SALES MANAGER, REGISTER DIVISION, ROCKWELL MANUFACTURING CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., SUBMITTED TO SECRETARY, U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION, WASHINGTON, D.C., JUNE 27, 1960

COMMISSION HEARING

The Rockwell-Ohmer taximeter is produced by the register division of Rockwell Manufacturing Co. The Ohmer taximeter, the most widely used domestic taximeter in this country, has been known to the taxicab industry for over 45 years. Because of our desire to continue in the taximeter business and to insure the continued employment of highly skilled labor, we are making this statement to point out certain facts and figures covering the danger of any further tariff reduction on taximeters imported into the United States. We are also covering the extremely precarious position of this industry because of the low-priced competition from overseas which exists today under the existing tariff rate.

Since it is our understanding that the function of the Commission is to make a "peril point" investigation as provided in section 3 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951, as amended, we are confident that it is not the intent of this Commission to take action which would lead to further serious curtailment in the manufacture and sales of domestic taximeters.

We will herein produce evidence that since the reduction in 1951 of the tariff rate on "taximeters or parts thereof, finished or unfinished," from 85 percent to 42½ percent, lower priced foreign-made taximeters have been imported in increasing quantities which have become alarming to American taximeter manufacturers.

2. Because of the nature of the taxicab industry the taximeter business is limited in size. There are approximately 69,000 licensed taxicabs in 484 cities over 25,000 population in the United States, 11,860 or over one-sixth of which are in New York City. Of these 69,000 taxicabs approximately 52,000 are metered. The remainder operate on a zone rate basis. It is estimated there are over 50,000 taxicabs in cities and towns under 25,000 population, relatively few of which are or will be metered because of what is considered a reasonably satisfactory flat rate operation. There are perhaps 12,000 taximeters in use in the larger size small cities under 25,000 population, making a grand total of approximately 64,000 taximeters in use.

Since anticipated life expectancy of taximeters extends over an average of 12 to 15 years, the annual replacement requirements of the industry will not exceed from 4,000 to 5,000 units. Additional new meter sales will vary depending upon conditions and upon additional cities changing over from zone to metered rates. There has been practically no increase in the number of licensed taxicabs in use during recent years which would indicate no anticipated expansion in the industry in the foreseeable future.

3. It is evident from figures made available to us by the Department of Commerce that following the reduction of the tariff on taximeters by one-half in July 1951, foreign manufacturers of taximeters have found it very profitable to sell in this country. In 1951 the total dollar value of imports under this category amounted to $5,848. In 1952 imports were $38,436. Since 1952 the average annual imports have amounted to over $92,000 which represents an alarming percent of the estimated number of units sold annually by the industry. Please refer to exhibit I for data on imports by years from various countries.

Since 1954 the Department of Commerce has not provided us with detailed figures of the number of units imported from each particular country. However, based on 1952 and 1953 reports, it is evident that manufacturer's selling prices c.i.f. New York varied from $37 to $90 with the most popular models averaging $50 to $65 per unit.

4. Because of the importance of New York City as a market for taximeters, importers of foreign-made meters have so far concentrated their efforts in this area. It is estimated that already nearly half of the taximeters in use in New York City are of foreign manufacture with the percent increasing at an alarming rate. On an annual basis, it is estimated that over 65 percent of New York City taximeter sales are foreign-made taximeters. Our new meter sales in New York City have dropped continuously since low priced foreign-made meters were introduced in 1951; whereas otherwise, on a national basis we have maintained a fairly uniform volume of taximeter business. It gives the domestic taximeter manufacturer the feeling of gravest concern to anticipate just how soon the same paralyzing results will be duplicated in other sections of the United States.

5. The intricate construction of the taximeter results in a high labor content of the final product. The Commission is, of course, familiar with the differences in wage rates as between the United States and countries in Western Europe and Japan. For example, the wage rate for a skilled operator in Sweden is 94 cents, in Germany it is 55 cents, and in Japan it is 25 cents. This compares with our wage rate of about $2.50 per hour. For this reason foreign-made taximeters can be supplied to the United States at generally less than half of the production costs of American manufacturers, and it is not possible for the domestic industry to compete with imported products on the same basis. In an effort to meet foreign competition, U.S. manufacturers of taximeters have been forced to forego normal price increases since 1951. However, in the period 1951–60 labor costs have increased by 46.7 percent according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. At current prices profits in the taximeter industry are extremely discouraging.

6. The 1951 tariff reduction has already given foreign manufacturers a definite advantage in the U.S. market to the point where the existence of the entire industry is seriously threatened. My company manufactures a variety of products, and the discontinuation of our taximeter production, while it would cause us to suffer a serious capital loss of our investment in plant, machinery, tools, and dies specifically designed for the manufacture of taximeters, and in the good will and reputation of this Rockwell-Ohmer product, which has been developed over 45 years, it would not seriously effect our organization as such. We believe that, if necessary, we can protect our shareholders by having our meter manufactured in Europe and arrange for importation and distribution in this country. We cannot, of course, insure and protect the employment of the highly skilled mechanics who have specialized in the manufacture of taximeters over many years. We believe that our position is an exception in the industry, which is mainly composed of a number of small, well-managed companies concentrating exclusively on the production of taximeters. For these other companies, the perilous position in which the industry finds itself today is far more serious. They may be faced with the closing down of their entire plants and organizations.

7. You will note from exhibit 1 that our major foreign competitors are in Sweden and Germany. In each case we are concerned with one single manufacturer in Sweden and one manufacturer in Germany. Both companies are large, highly capitalized industrial organizations, employing several thousand. The previous tariff reduction in 1951 has given them a definite price advantage over the local industry, and they have already obtained a substantial share of the U.S. market for taximeters. Any further reduction of the tariff on taximeters can have only one result and one intention, and that is the virtual dissolution of this American industry, largely composed of small individual American businesses. Two manufacturers have discontinued the taximeter business during the past 5 years. One, the Pittsburgh Taximeter Co., had been one of the leading manufacturers of taximeters for many years.

8. As previously stated, there are approximately 64,000 taximeters in use in this country. If the U.S. taximeter industry is forced out of business, individual operators and owners would have great difficulty in maintaining these meters due to their inability of securing spare and replacement parts.

9. The U.S. taximeter industry is composed of four manufacturers supplying the domestic market, and while this industry may not appear to be large as such, its importance in wartime and periods of national emergency is out of all proportion to its size. During World War II, the Ohmer Corp. (which is now the Register Division of the Rockwell Manufacturing Co.) produced the Servo motor assemblies for the Norden bombsight, aircraft gun-turret controls for the flying fortress, control (steering) columns for the B–29 superfortress, and other bombers, components for radar equipment, and many miscellaneous aircraft parts and subassemblies which call for extreme precision working abilities up to .0002 of an inch. We have in our file citations from practically every segment of the Armed Forces, testifying to the skill and precision of our employees in governmental contracts.

During the Korean emergency this division likewise carried out contracts involving precision work in connection with the manufacture of oxygen regulators and other complex defense production items. We feel certain that this Commission would not wish to be responsible for the loss of the skill and availability of these essential keymen in the event of a future emergency.

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, there is on the Consent Calendar S. 1806, a bill which amends the Transportation of Explosives Act. Among other things this bill contains legislation which would place private and contract carriers under regulations now governing common carriers. Private and contract carriers carrying explosives and other dangerous articles could be fined up to $1,000 or imprisoned for 1 year or both for violating ICC regulations. If death or bodily injury of a person resulted the penalty would be a fine of up to $10,000 or 10 years imprisonment or both.

Why do I urge this action?

The city of Roseburg is in Oregon's Fourth Congressional District, which I represent. Shortly after 1 a.m., August 7, 1959, Roseburg was rocked by a blast which killed 13 persons, injured more than 100, and caused property damage of nearly $12 million. The city is rebuilding. Its citizens have done marvelous things. But what happened there when a private truck carrying explosives was left unattended in a downtown area could happen anywhere in this country.

The Interstate Commerce Commission approves S. 1806. The ICC held an on-the-scene inquiry in Roseburg in September to determine the cause of the explosion. The Commission found that it occurred as the direct result of the explosives-laden truck being left locked but unattended while parked upon a public street in the congested part of a city.

The hard-working Judiciary Committee of this House has gone into S. 1806 and reported it.

This week the July 2, 1960, issue of the Saturday Evening Post carries a well-written and well-illustrated account of the Roseburg disaster. The magazine's lead article entitled "The Night Our Town Blew Up," is written by Mrs. Bonnie Wallace Riggs, of Roseburg. Photographs taken by Mr. Paul Jenkins of Roseburg illustrate the true account.

I recommend Mrs. Riggs' article. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the Saturday Evening Post account by Mrs. Riggs, a news release concerning my testimony before the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee considering amendments to the Transportation of Explosives Act and a news story which appeared in the June 25, 1960, edition of the Roseburg News-Review:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, June 2, 1960]

THE NIGHT OUR TOWN BLEW UP

(By Bonnie Wallace Riggs)

(The people of this little Oregon town will never forget the night last summer that changed their lives. One of them tells about the holocaust.)

At about 9:30 p.m. a 2½-ton truck of the Pacific Powder Co. rolled into our town of Roseburg, Oreg. The driver, George B. Rutherford, jockeyed his rig into the driveway in front of the Gerretsen Building Supply Co. warehouse on Pine Street, three blocks from the main business district. He handled the rig gingerly, for his cargo was 2 tons of dynamite and 4½ tons of nitrocarbonitrate, part of which was to be delivered the next day to Gerretsen, at a powder magazine 5 miles out of town. The material was mainly for the use of work gangs constructing roads in nearby logging projects.

Rutherford turned off his switch, climbed down from his cab and walked three blocks to Roseburg's leading hotel, the Umpqua, to spend the night.

It was a typical Roseburg summer evening, August 6, 1959, warm and quiet. Most residents of this town of 12,000 located in a hunting and fishing area, had nothing more worrisome on their minds than the chances for Roseburg's American Legion junior baseball team to win the State championship playoffs during the weekend. Except for night shift workers in the lumber and plywood mills in the area and a few teenagers driving around in search of fun, most people were in bed well before midnight.

But at 1:05 Friday morning, a telephone call to the fire department reported a blaze at the Gerretsen Building. Nine minutes later the explosives truck blew up with a roar which many residents mistook for a nuclear blast. My family and I live 3 miles from Gerretsen's, and beyond a hill. Even so, the blast shook our house as if an earthquake had happened. But we were lucky and suffered no damage. Indeed, we concluded that a jetplane had shaken us with a sonic boom, and not until the next morning did we learn what had really happened.

The explosion killed outright, or fatally injured, 13 persons and wounded 125 others, many seriously. It overturned and twisted freight cars on a nearby siding, burning several. Seven city blocks were denuded and twenty-eight others—including the main business district—were reduced to a wreckage of broken glass, fallen cornices, and shattered roofs. Fire spurted from a half dozen major buildings. Windows were broken and plaster was cracked in almost every home within a 2-mile radius. Big stained-glass windows in churches clattered to the street, and chimneys jerked away from the houses they served, as fragments littered the floors of china and lamp stores and glass in automobiles popped in or out. Property loss approached $12 million. Where the truck and the Gerretsen Building had stood was a yawning crater more than 40 feet in diameter and 15 feet deep.

The explosion was a classic example of sudden and unexpected disaster. Now that almost a year has passed, the answers to many pertinent questions are available. How did those who died happen to be where they were at the critical moment? How did their fates intermesh? Was anyone there except those whose normal pattern of life called for them to be there? Was anyone absent, who, for one reason or another, likely would have been there, but was not? Were there outstanding feats of heroism?

To answer the last question first, consider the cases of two good Samaritans: dark, handsome, 17-year-old Dennis Tandy and Richard Knight, 20, who had learned many a lesson about fire control as an enlisted man in the U.S. Air Force before receiving a hardship discharge. He now lived with his mother and disabled father, and worked at a filling station.

Dennis Tandy worked at the Nordic Veneer Co. and had been learning to operate the big lathe which peels logs into veneer sheets for plywood. For a boy his age Dennis had special reason to work. Shortly after turning 17 he had quit his junior class at high school to marry Marilyn Hays, 18. The wedding was on December 31, 1958; and at the time of the disaster the Tandys were expecting a baby within 2 months.

Dennis' shift ended at midnight; but on this particular night he stayed a little longer to study his lathe and its operation. It was about 12:30 a.m. before he started his midget automobile, an ivory-colored Fiat 600, and picked up Marilyn at her parents' home, where he had left her on his way to work in the afternoon.

En route to their own home, they passed the Gerretsen Building. Dennis, thinking he had seen a little blaze in a row of trash cans, turned the car around and investigated. There was a blaze. Dennis jumped from his car and tried to keep it from spreading by rolling some of the trash cans into the street.

He shouted to his wife to drive somewhere and send in an alarm. She drove to a filling station a block or so away and told the attendant to telephone the fire department. The attendant did so. This was the 1:05 a.m. alarm previously mentioned. Marilyn Tandy then returned to the fire, now a good-sized blaze gaining headway inside the building. (Some authorities now believe the fire actually started inside the building, but nobody really knew then nor knows now.)

By 1:07 a.m. a firetruck manned by Assistant Chief Roy McFarland and fireman Lyle Wescott arrived, and soon the two men had a hose connected to fire hydrant and were playing water on the mushrooming blaze. Wescott was wearing black "turnouts"—protective clothing. But even though he was shielded by a parked truck—the truck bearing the 6½ tons of explosives—Wescott soon found the radiant heat unbearable and had to retreat. As he crossed the street, he realized that his chest was burned and flesh was sloughing from his hands. Police Officer Merle Jensen, arriving just then, immediately took him to a hospital. Wescott, in great pain, was relieved at his place operating the hose by Richard Knight, who had just arrived from his filling station. In his Air Force days Knight had received firefighting training and was heroically eager to contribute his skilled assistance. Another fire unit also arrived and began hooking up its hoses on the opposite side of the Gerretsen building.

On returning from giving the alarm, Marilyn Tandy parked the Fiat in a lot about 100 feet from the fire, and approached the Gerretsen Building on foot. Frightened by the size of the fire, she called out, "Dennis, let's go."

He answered, "No, but you get back to the car."

She stood rooted at first, but the heat became too much for her and she hurried toward the Fiat, looking back every few steps. Dennis Tandy had donned a protective jacket from the firetruck and was trying to chop open with an ax the locked cab of a Gerretsen truck which was in the way. He wanted to move it before it, too, caught fire. That was the last Marilyn saw of her husband.

Curiously, none of the little band of firefighters appeared to realize that the second truck—the big 2½-ton rig which dominated the scene—was loaded with explosives. It was nearly 1:13 a.m. when a puff of breeze stirred the almost windless night, clearing the smoke and revealing the "Explosives" signs on all four sides of the truck. McFarland and Knight immediately turned their hose from the burning building and played water on the truck. Some 10 seconds later, someone—whose identity never was established—yelled, "Get the hell out of here; that dynamite's going to blow." But McFarland and Knight stuck with their hose, and Tandy kept on chopping at the cab of the second truck.

Meanwhile, Marilyn Tandy made it back to the Fiat and slammed the door. Then the explosives truck blew up. It was now 1:14 a.m.

The little car was blown, right side up, about 100 feet. Its back window popped out in one piece. Other windows shattered and blew inward, their fragments peppering Marilyn. But, oddly, she was not even cut, although her dress was torn from neck to waist and bobby pins were knocked out of her pin curls.

All about her fires were starting and fallen electric wires were crackling in showers of sparks. She got out, picked her way to the place of devastation and called out her husband's name; but he was beyond answering. So were, among others, Richard Knight and Roy McFarland. (Their bodies were found later under debris; Tandy's body was under the truck he had been trying to save.)

Great blasts usually produce freakish effects, and the Roseburg blast created its share. Union business agent, Chuck Lynch, in the downtown area, heard the police and fire sirens and started in his car toward the center of commotion. When he was about 50 feet from the blazing building, someone flagged him down and yelled to him to turn around and get away. Lynch had just completed the fastest U-turn of his career when the explosives went off. Like a superpowerful hand, the blast belted Lynch's car up to 70 miles an hour within 200 feet. Then, as if to gratify a whim, the hand began to push from the front. In less than another 100 feet the car was slowed down to 35, although Lynch had the accelerator pedal on the floor board. Most of the car's exterior chromium trimming was ripped away, an unopened box of cigars on the seat beside him blew apart, and all the cigars were shredded into bits. Lynch was unhurt.

The ordeal of Carol Marical had its ludicrous moments, although they were overshadowed by tragedy. Miss Marical, a pretty redhead, was on her way home from the Umpqua Hotel, where she was taking instructions to be a restaurant hostess in the Indian Room, a popular eating place. She was accompanied by her friend, Bonnie Jean Berg. Miss Berg, by prearrangement, met her at the hotel shortly after 1 a.m., when the Indian Room closed. Together they began strolling toward Miss Marical's home, where Miss Berg was to spend the night as a guest. Dallying to watch the Gerretsen fire, they stood in front of the Bill Stock Motors Co. building, across the street and a little more than 100 feet away. But after a few minutes, they stepped off the curb, intending to resume their homeward stroll.

Carol told her mother later, "I heard a sizzling sound and knew that something terrible was going to happen. I dropped to the pavement and curled myself into a ball, with my hands over my face, trying to make as small a target as possible. The big explosion seemed to come from down deep. An eruption like an ocean wave of flame rose high in the air, and I recall Bonnie Jean calling, 'Carol, Carol.'"

Carol Marical's dress was ripped and blown completely off her. Her glasses and shoes also were blown away. The shoes never were found, but later someone found her glasses—inside the Stock Motors building alongside the body of Bonnie Jean Berg. Bonnie had been only a couple of steps behind Carol, but they were blown in different directions. Blown 150 feet down the street, Carol never lost consciousness completely. When she stopped rolling, she got up and tried to run, but the paving felt hot to her shoeless feet. She fell and, unable to get up again, crawled on her hands and knees, seeking someone to help her.

Fred Siles, a millworker, lives half a mile from the Garretsen building and had driven over to watch the excitement. But no sooner had he parked his car than the explosion came. Siles was blown some 50 feet through the plate-glass window of another automobile agency, but was able to get up and step out through the glassless frame.

He then found Carol Marical, helped her into his car and drove her to a hospital, asking over and over, in a confused way, "Are you hurt, lady? Are you hurt?"

Miss Marical remembered that the question made her laugh in spite of her injuries. "There I was," she said, "with my dress blown away, covered with blood from head to foot and unable to walk—and someone keeps asking if I'm hurt."

She was hurt, quite badly, as she was to learn at the hospital. Her instinctive act of rolling herself into a ball had protected her face, but the rest of her body had been peppered with flying metal and glass. One metal bolt had driven through her arm and penetrated her chest cavity. The hospital already was jammed. No operating room was available until 2:30 a.m., but in the meantime attendants plucked out six bolts—possibly from the explosives truck—which were protruding from her skin. When she reached the operating room, teams of surgeons took turns working over her until noon, and 10 days were to pass before she was off the critical list.

While waiting at the hospital for the shock of his own experience to wear off, Fred Siles received a new shock when his 15-year-old son, Jimmy, was brought in on a stretcher. The elder Siles was shocked again when he learned that Jimmy had been lying unconscious about a block away when Siles was assisting Miss Marical to rise from the street.

Jimmy, an honor roll high school student, had nothing special to do on that fateful evening. His good friend, Larry Dysert, 17, dropped around after dinner in his 1948 automobile and suggested a ride. Their actions were typical of young boys with a car on a warm summer night in a small town. They stopped at the city swimming pool to chat for a while with other youngsters. They went to the Snappy Service, a restaurant, for something to eat, drove around some more, went to Larry's house and from there to a filling station where one of their pals was nightman.

It was well after midnight when the visit ended, and Larry Dysert and Jimmy Siles were homeward bound when they saw flames pouring out of the Gerretsen Building. They swung around and headed for the blaze. Larry parked alongside the Bill Stock Motors showroom, diagonally across from the Gerretsen Building, but this spot proved too warm, so they found another place a block away. As Larry pulled to the curb, Jimmy jumped out eagerly and called, "Come on, let's go" then sprinted toward the fire.

Then the explosives truck let go. Larry, who had taken just a few steps, was knocked down and his shoes were blown off, but his injuries were only bruises. Jimmy Siles lay unconscious, a 3-inch bolt driven into the base of his skull. The bolt was removed surgically and Jimmy lived, but he still is in a coma nearly a year after the accident.

Bill and Eleanor Unrath lived in a large, comfortable house next to their place of business, a Coca-Cola bottling plant. The bottling plant occuped a corner opposite the Gerretsen Building. An apartment on the second floor of the plant was occupied, and had been for some time, by Martin Lusk and his wife.

Fate, or coincidence, was about to play a grim joke on the Lusks. Lusk, who had worked for Unrath in the bottling plant, had quit the week before to return to his original home in La Grande, Oreg. The Lusks had their trailer packed with personal possessions and were ready to leave early in the morning.

Everyone in the two households was asleep when the sirens began to wail. Mrs. Lusk, awakening first, opened her bedroom window and shouted to the Unraths that the Gerretsen Building was afire. Bill Unrath ran for the bottling plant and, with Lusk's help, tried—without too much luck—to get the plant's protective hoseline through a skylight to the roof. From there they could have brought its stream to play on the Gerretsen fire.

While they were struggling, perhaps against a jammed skylight, Don Gerretsen, son of the owner of the building-supply firm, rushed into the bottling plant, looking for a telephone to call his father about the fire. Bill Unrath told him to use the one in the kitchen of the Lusk apartment. Young Gerretsen had just put in his call when the world around him rocked. He was knocked violently against a wall, and one foot was caught under some heavy object. To free it, he had to slip out of his shoe and leave the shoe behind. The stairway had been destroyed. Gerretsen climbed out a window and slid down an outside wall, escaping with minor injuries.

He was the last to see Unrath and Lusk alive. Trapped, they died either from the blast injuries or in the new fire which quickly destroyed the bottling plant, the Unrath home, the Lusk automobile, and their neatly packed trailer.

Of the Unraths' two daughters, Sabra, 18, was to have returned that evening from a Camp Fire Girls' camp where she was a counselor. But by a stroke of good luck in reverse the camp's truck broke down, and Sabra didn't get home until noon the next day. The Unraths' other daughter, Mary Elise, 20, had as overnight guests two schoolgirls from Bremerton, Wash., Lauretta Rusher and Lorraine Ross. They were scheduled to leave the next day for a church youth conference in Los Angeles.

When the fire first got under way and Unrath and Lusk had gone into the bottling plant, their wives, thinking the blaze would be controlled quickly, stood on the sidewalk in front of the Unrath house. The dynamite explosion knocked the two women about 75 feet in different directions, as it had knocked Miss Marical and Miss Berg. But except for bruises and shock, they were spared. Mrs. Unrath stumbled back to the house, which now was on fire, to save the three girls. Because the blast had blocked the stairway with debris, she could only stand outside and shout to them to jump from a second-floor bedroom window.

All three girls were bleeding from glass-fragment wounds and were spattered with bits of black insulation materials from the walls, but they jumped as instructed, and only Mary Elise Unrath was seriously hurt. She fractured two vertebrae and was to spend 5 weeks in a hospital.

In discussing the heroes of the explosion, Roseburg citizens give a special place to Harry Carmichael, a 70-year-old veteran of two wars, who was driving home from the Monarch Card Room, a restaurant-tavern rendezvous which he helped to operate. Hoping to be of service, he headed for the fire in his car. The explosion slammed the automobile and its driver mercilessly. Carmichael's left arm—which he may have had partially out the window—was severed by the blast or some flying piece of metal, and his chest was punctured. Nevertheless, this septuagenarian got out of the wrecked car, walked to a rescue squad, and helped them by directing them to spots where he knew people were trapped. Weakening at length, Carmichael gave in to the urging of others and allowed himself to be driven to the hospital. He died there while doctors were preparing to operate.

Wayne Townsend had the misfortune of living too near the spot of destiny. He and his wife Letta, occupied an apartment above the Stock Motors showroom. Townsend went down to move his car, which was parked too close to the Gerretsen building, but chose the wrong time. He never reached the car, and it was several days before his body was found in the rubble.

For the same period of time the bodies of two other victims lay concealed. They were those of Rufus Wiggins, Jr., a logger, and Mrs. Rollin J. McDonald, 62. Wiggins roomed near the center of town, and it was his custom to take "breakfast," shortly after midnight, in a restaurant not far from Gerretsen's. A truck usually picked him up at 2:30 a.m. and carried him to work.

After the fire, police surmised that Wiggins had left the restaurant to see the blaze—which is what Mrs. McDonald and her husband started to do from their home nearby. The blast caught them a block from the fire. McDonald, seriously injured, survived; but his wife's body was found under the rubbish which had been a farmers' cooperative building.

The Kuykendalls suffered the most of any family in town. Alvin Kuykendall, a steady, soft-spoken man, had spent his life building up a small business—a bicycle shop—and buying a house. Both were free of debt, and the business was showing a modest profit. But the location of their house and business, across the street from each other and half a block from Gerretsen's, was tragically unfortunate. The Kuykendall's were awakened by the sirens while young Dennis Tandy was attempting to put out the fire singlehanded. The whole family got out of bed and assembled at a big window which provided a grandstand box. With Kuykendall were his wife, Lela, and their two daughters, Janet, 22, and Virginia, a tyke of 4. A firetruck and a police car screamed to stops under their window. Out of the police car jumped Patrolman Don DeSues, who went to work immediately, trying to keep traffic lanes free of sightseers' cars so that the firefighters wouldn't be impeded. DeSues—who would be dead in 10 minutes—worked hard.

After a few minutes of watching the excitement, Kuykendall excused himself and went to the bathroom. He was still there when the monster blast hit the house with all its fire and fury. Mrs. Kuykendall and the girls were showered with thousands of bits of glass and knocked against the walls. In the bathroom Kuykendall was pinned against the bathtub by a 500-pound chest of solid oak. Burning lath was peeling off the ceiling in fiery gobs and falling all around him, and he was in great pain. But his family could not hear his cries for help. People outside the house responded, walking right through holes in the house, and helped the whole family into an ambulance. Ten minutes later both house and bicycle shop were in ruins.

Mrs. Kuykendall and little Virginia died of their injuries. For 5 days Janet could see nothing; but after doctors had removed 20 pieces of imbedded glass from her eyeballs, her normal sight began to return. She also had cuts and bruises over most of her body.

But Alvin Kuykendall was in more serious condition. His right arm and leg were fractured in several places and required months of pins, plates, and casts. Six weeks after the explosion the leg pins slipped and doctors had to operate all over again. Several weeks after that his arm was broken again in recuperative exercises, and this time it had to be reinforced with a bone graft and a metal plate.

Today he is in a wheel chair and faces many more months of sitting, waiting for his arm and leg to heal. His dream is to get another bicycle shop started. "It's all I know," he says. The only insurance he had was on the bicycle shop, and most of the yield of that has been spent on living expenses. Yet he looks forward hopefully to working again and getting out of debt once more. Ridding himself of debt is an admitted obsession with him.

Fortunately there was a happy ending for Janet—or, as she puts it, "a beginning." In June she was married to Einar Beck, Jr., a boy she knew in school.

Last October Marilyn Tandy's baby arrived on schedule, a healthy, plump boy. He promptly was named Dennis in honor of his heroic young father. Mother and son live with Marilyn's parents. Of her future and the baby's, she says, "When Dennis starts to school, maybe I'll go to a beauty school. I don't know what else to do."

Carol Marical was able to leave the hospital after 2 months, but did not feel well enough to return to her job at the Indian Room. For months she had nightmares in which, as in real life nearly a year ago, she heard the voice of her ill-fated friend, Bonnie Jean Berg, shouting, "Carol! Carol!" And she couldn't do a thing to help. But her story also took a happy turn with her marriage last spring to Frank Copeland.

George B. Rutherford, driver of the truck, ran from the Umpqua Hotel during the fire and himself was injured in the explosion, spending 2 days in a Roseburg hospital. He then went back to his home in Washington and later returned to work for the powder company, but as a workman in the production of explosives, not as a truckdriver. The company disposed of several remaining trucks, and early in 1960 was moving its explosives in rented vehicles.

Of course, the legal story of the Roseburg blast is only beginning. A Douglas County grand jury met in September 1959, hearing 22 witnesses in secret session. It indicted the Pacific Powder Co., owner of the explosives truck, for involuntary manslaughter. But in March 1960, Oregon Circuit Judge James Main sustained a defense demurrer, holding that the Oregon involuntary-manslaughter statute is not applicable to corporations. The grand jury returned no indictments against individuals. District Attorney Avery Thompson later gave notice of his intention to appeal the decision.

The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Oregon Public Utility Commissioner held a joint hearing at Roseburg, also in September 1959. Pacific Powder Co.'s plant superintendent and the driver of the truck both testified they understood the ICC requirement that vehicles transporting explosives were not to be left unattended during transit. They said an ICC safety inspector had warned the superintendent about the rule only a day before the truck left the company plant at Tenino, Wash. Both testified they discussed at considerable length the matter of making certain that the vehicle would be attended, just before Rutherford's departure on the trip to Roseburg. No decision was reached, however, as to a proper place for parking the truck, and the driver departed knowing that delivery could not be made until the next day.

The ICC, in its hearing report issued December 7, 1959, found that Pacific Powder and its driver violated motor carrier safety regulations in leaving the vehicle unattended, in failing to avoid congested places, and in parking in congested places. The Commission concluded that if Pacific Powder and its driver had not violated these regulations, the explosion accident would not have occurred.

The Pacific Powder Co. of Washington, the Pacific Powder Sales Co. of Oregon, the Gerretsen Building Supply Co., W. H., G. H., and Donald Gerretsen, and Rutherford all have been named defendants in a long series of civil actions filed in the Douglas County courts. By early June nearly 30 cases were on file, each charging almost identically that the defendants had failed to move the explosives to their destination "without unnecessary delay," that they had failed to provide special care to guard the vehicle, and that they had violated ICC regulations in leaving the vehicle unattended and in parking it in a congested area.

The actions ranged from a $500,000 personal-injury suit on behalf of the comatose Jimmy Siles through a number of $20,000 suits by estates of persons killed—$20,000 is the maximum collectible for a wrongful death in Oregon—to property-damage suits in which insurance companies listed scores of claims already paid.

None of these cases had come to trial when this was written, and about 6 weeks ago Attorney David P. Templeton on behalf of the defendants asked changes of venue in several cases, claiming that his clients could not obtain a fair trial in Douglas County. His petition stated that insurance companies already had paid more than $4 million in property-damage claims because of the blast.

At about the same time an insurance underwriters' group in Portland, Oreg., filed an interpleader action in Federal district court, seeking consolidation of the various claims and court direction as to what they should do with the $500,000 for which the powder company was insured, in case judgments were entered against them. It seemed clear that the total assets of all defendants, including insurance, could not begin to equal the claims filed against them.

But in Roseburg all this is less important than living. Nearly a year after the exposion the flattened blocks still are mostly barren, the rubbish cleared, but very little building done. The main business district looks mostly new, with fresh paint and thousands of square feet of new windows. But around it are evidences of tragedy: A hotel boarded up except for the first floor; a church with a gaping hole where a huge stained-glass window had been; a row of small homes half occupied, half still as the blast left them, with roofs askew and chimneys tottering; charred wreckage where a feed mill once was.

Much of the rebuilding awaits a master plan, which an urban-renewal committee has been trying to formulate. Roseburg, which calls itself the timber capital of the Nation, would like to promote the use of wood in the rebuilding program, and planners want to utilize the natural beauty of the south Umpqua River, flowing past one edge of the blast area.

City Manager John Warburton is enthusisastic on the future of the community, with its plywood, lumber, and recreation industries backed up by agriculture and stock raising. "If people continue to work together as they did after the blast," he said recently, "we won't have any trouble in rebuilding right."

Although Warburton is only a rookie Roseburg resident, he almost qualifies as a native son. He had been city manager just a few months when the explosives truck erupted—and knocked him out of bed. So he's a newcomer no longer.

In fact, many Roseburg people were blasted out of their beds that night last year, and many still are jumpy. Recently some military jets flew overhead, crashing through the sound barrier in thunderous booms that shook houses and rattled windows, giving everyone that same panicky, empty feeling we all had the night our town blew up.

NEWS RELEASE FROM THE OFFICE OF CONGRESSMAN CHARLES O. PORTER

Congressman CHARLES O. PORTER, Democrat of Oregon, today, May 25, testified before the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee considering amendments to the Transportation of Explosives Act. PORTER told the committee he favored S. 1806 which contains legislation which would place private and contract carriers under regulations now governing common carriers. The Senate has approved S. 1806.

In his prepared testimony Representative PORTER discussed the August 7, 1959, explosion in Roseburg, Oreg., of a truck loaded with dynamite and nitrocarbonitrate. The vehicle, a private carrier, had been parked and locked and left unattended in downtown Roseburg. Its explosion at 1:15 a.m. brought death to at least 13 persons, injury to 125 others, and property damage estimated at $12 million.

PORTER observed that the Interstate Commerce Commission following its on-the-scene investigation, September 1–3, had found that the explosion occurred as the direct result of the explosives laden truck being left locked but unattended while parked upon a public street in the congested part of a city. The ICC told PORTER it was done in disregard of regulations of the ICC designed to prevent such an accident.

The ICC has recommended that private and contract carriers be subject to regulations now governing common carriers. PORTER said he felt that equalizing the regulations would be a positive step. He said the Roseburg disaster could be repeated anywhere at any time, and he urged favorable subcommittee action. PORTER had written to the Judiciary Committee January 11, 1960, outlining in detail the need for legislation which has been approved by the Senate. At that time he supplied the committee with information on the Roseburg explosion.

Under the proposed legislation private and contract carriers carrying explosives and other dangerous articles could be fined up to $1,000 or imprisoned for 1 year or both for violating ICC regulations. If death or bodily injury of a person resulted the penalty would be a fine of up to $10,000 or 10 years imprisonment or both.

MAGAZINE STORY ON AUGUST 7 BLAST COMES NEXT WEEK

The coming issue of the Saturday Evening Post, which will reach mail subscribers over the weekend and go on sale on newsstands early next week, will contain a feature story on Roseburg's disastrous fire and explosion last August 7.

The story, indexed on the outside cover and appearing as the lead article in the magazine, is written by Bonnie Wallace Riggs. It is entitled "The Night Our Town Blew Up."

The author uses very interesting technique in which she relates the experiences of individuals connected with the tragedy. Little is told of property damage other than in a general way. Instead, the article deals with the personal side of the fire and explosion.

The article is profusely illustrated. Some of the photographs previously appeared in the News-Review. They were made by Paul Jenkins who recently retired from full-time photographic work with the News-Review.

Accomplishments of U.S. Space Exploration Under the Republican Administration

OF

Hon. EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by the very distinguished Senator from California and the Republican whip, Mr. KUCHEL, on the accomplishments of U.S. space exploration under the Republican administration.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF U.S. SPACE EXPLORATION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION

(By U. S. Senator THOMAS H. KUCHEL, of California, Senate Republican whip)

The accomplishments of the U.S. space exploration program under the Republican administration can be divided into the following sections for a clear-cut picture of what the United States has done and is doing:

1. Organization and resources.
2. A scorecard detailing competition with the U.S.S.R.
3. A brief survey of the U.S. space program as evidenced in the successful shots in that program.
4. A delineation of important milestones in the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's 10-year plan.

When NASA declared itself to be ready for business on October 1, 1958, it began work on:

(a) Completing the several programs which were initiated by the Advanced Research Projects Agency of the Department of Defense.

(b) Developing a sound but bold and imaginative long-range plan with specific projects for the next 2 years calling for concentrated attention to the need for more powerful launch vehicles and a program of satellite and deep space flights that will approximate 26 major flights in each year.

(c) Integrating the efforts of the 8,000 people inherited from the great NACA organization with the 2,400 fine people of the jet propulsion laboratory and the 5,500 people who made up the famous Von Braun group at the NASA Marshall Space Flight Center, and developing 2,000-man operation at the new Goddard Space Flight Center at Greenbelt, Md., and drawing together a headquarters staff of more than 550 people in Washington.

(d) Creating this new organization when the eyes of all the world placed the United States in the spotlight of the space race.

As of July 1, 1960, the NASA will be operating at $915 million annual rate as compared with a $335 million annual expenditure rate 21 months earlier. (The grand total of all U.S. missiles programs from an obligational standpoint for fiscal year 1961 is estimated at $6,962 million, subject to revision.) With a total of more than 18,000 people—one-third or more of them professional people—NASA represents the Government's greatest research organization and, in many ways, its most unique. Its product is new knowledge and the development of the techniques necessary to acquire that knowledge and apply it for the benefit of mankind.

COMPETITION WITH THE U.S.S.R.

The U.S.S.R. appears to excel the United States in the thrust of its rocket-powered launch vehicle system. Their substantially higher thrust level has permitted them to undertake spectacular missions requiring the carrying of relatively advanced guidance equipment in addition to the payload instrumentation—a combined weight substantially beyond that which we have been able to fly.

In spite of this advantage, it seems clear that the United States has clearly bested the Soviet Union in the breadth and depth of its program development and particularly in the quality, quantity, and importance of the scientific results of its flights.

It is reasonable to believe, however, that the steady growth of the U.S. program, the obvious willingness of the United States to share its information and competence with other nations, and the beneficial and, at times, striking information being derived from the U.S. experiments is beginning to make itself felt as a positive counterforce to any Soviet propaganda.

Highlights of the Nation's space exploration program (with some remarks about results of the U.S.S.R. program). The direct exploration of space by means of unmanned vehicles traveling in space began on October 4, 1957, with the launching of Sputnik I by the U.S.S.R. In the intervening 30 months there have been launched successfully 22 additional earth satellites which have yielded much scientific information about the space environment by radio telemetry of data to the ground. Three satellites were launched by the U.S.S.R. on November 3, 1957, May 15, 1958, and May 15, 1960.

The United States has launched 19 satellites, the first on January 31, 1958, and the most recent on May 24, 1960.

Five were called Explorers, launched by Jupiter C's in three cases, Thor-Able II in one, and Juno II in one.

Three were Vanguards.

Seven were Discoverers, launched by Thor-Agena A's.

One used an Atlas for the communications experiment, Project Score.

One, the meterological satellite of Project Tiros, was launched by a Thor-Able IV.

One, the navigation satellite Transit, was launched by a Thor-Able Star.

One, the missile early warning satellite Midas, was launched by an Atlas-Agena.

Seven space probes have been launched since October 4, 1957, three by the U.S.S.R., four by the United States.

All of the U.S.S.R. space probes were directed toward the Moon; one launched on January 2, 1959, was claimed by the Russians as having passed within a few diameters of the Moon, and went into an orbit around the Sun.

The second, launched on September 12, 1959, hit the Moon, or so the Russians said.

The third, launched on October 4, 1959, passed close enough to take pictures of the far side of the Moon and was deflected by the gravitational field of the Moon to return toward the Earth.

The first U.S. space probe, launched on October 11, 1958, traveled to a distance of 70,700 miles.

The second, launched on December 6, 1958, traveled to a distance of 63,580 miles.

The third, launched on March 3, 1959, went into orbit around the Sun, communication with it being maintained to a distance of 407,000 miles.

The fourth was launched on March 11, 1960, inward toward the orbit of Venus, and on May 8 was at a distance of a little more than 8 million miles from the Earth with data still being received by telemetry.

Each of the satellites and space probes has produced much information on various aspects of the space environment itself and of environmental conditions within space vehicles. Many of the missions have been directed toward scientific objectives relating to the Earth and its atmosphere and ionosphere. To illustrate the types of information returned, you may consider the return from Sputnik II, Lunik III, Pioneer V, and Tiros I.

Sputnik II was launched into an elliptical orbit with initial perigee of 140 miles and initial apogee of 1,038 miles inclined at 65 degrees to the equator. It carried the dog Laika for measurement of physiological reaction of an animal to space flight. Its instruments measured cosmic rays, solar ultraviolet, and X-radiation. Temperature and pressures within the satellite were measured.

Significant solar influence on density in the upper atmosphere was noted from measurements of fluctuations in satellite drag which were directly correlated with solar activity. Cosmic ray counting rate increased with height, not understood at the time, but later found to be associated with the Van Allen radiation belt discovered with the instruments in Explorer I.

Lunik III apparently produced the first pictures of the far side of the moon. Lunik III demonstrated maneuverability in a large spacecraft, the successful storage of pictures on film and their later transmission back to Earth, according to the Russians. Apparently no further scientific data were obtained because of early failure of the power supply or transmission system.

The Pioneer V space probe, weighing 94.8 pounds, was accelerated to a velocity of 24,869 miles per hour in an orbit about the Sun inclined inward toward the orbit of Venus. Its period is about 311 days. Its perihelion is about 74,700,000 miles, which is about 18 million miles closer to the Sun than the orbit of the Earth.

Long-range projection of the trajectory forecasts that Pioneer V will be farthest from the Earth—183 million miles—in September 1962 and that the Earth and probe will approach within 16 million miles in November 1965.

Because of the eccentricity of the probe orbit, the probe again will come within 15.6 million miles in April 1966. A closer approach than this will not occur until 1989, when the two will come within 2 million miles of each other, according to present estimates.

The probe carries instruments to measure charged particles in space—i.e., an ionization chamber and Geiger-Mueller tube to measure total radiation—and a triple coincidence cosmic ray proportional counter. The probe also carries a micrometeorite counter, a magnetometer, and instruments for measurement of temperatures and attitude. Power is furnished by solar cells mounted on paddles. There are two transmitters, designed to permit communication at distances up to 50 million miles, although there are now indications that degradation of the batteries may halt transmission between 10 million and 20 million miles.

Tiros I is a 270-pound satellite which carries two television cameras to observe cloud formations and transmit the pictures to stations on the ground.

It was launched in a nearby circular orbit with perigee of 435 miles and apogee of 468 miles, with a period of 99.15 minutes. It is stabilized by spinning, thus maintaining a fixed direction in space. Pictures are obtained when the satellite is in that part of its orbit where the camera sees the sunlit portion of the Earth.

The satellite is provided with tape recorders which can record as many as 32 pictures for later transmission to the ground stations.

Thousands of pictures have been obtained of cloud formations.

Tiros promises a major forward step in observations of major storms and frontal systems.

On the basis of this and future meteorological satellites, it is hoped to develop within a few years an operational system for routine use in weather forecasting.

SPACE TRAVEL BY MAN

For present purposes, the NASA is interested in the bearing of the information obtained on the prospects for space travel by man. The data obtained on the pressure, density, and temperature are required for rational design of any spacecraft, whether carrying man or instruments. Similarly, data on the ionosphere are of interest because of the electrical charging of the vehicle and its effects on radio communication from the vehicle and on its drag.

One of the major results of the first satellite launchings was the discovery by James A. Van Allen and his colleagues of a belt of charged particles trapped in the magnetic field of the earth which produced radiation on striking a space vehicle.

Further studies have shown that the structure of this region is quite complex and the outer zone varies in extent with solar activity.

We have learned considerably about outer space, but much basic information is yet to be obtained before man ventures very far away from the earth. Specifically, there are formidable technical developments needed to assure the success of manned journeys to the moon and to the planets of the solar system.

THE U.S. LONG-RANGE PLAN FOR SPACE EXPLORATION

Listed below are the highlights of the 10-year plan developed by NASA and presented to the Congress early in 1960. It is to be noted that forecasting research and development activities for many years in the future is a questionable procedure.

What can be undertaken 2 years from now depends on what is learned in experiments to be undertaken in the intervening 2 years. Nevertheless, in a rapidly moving technology involving long leadtimes, it is possible to identify objectives which should be possible of accomplishment given normally accelerated advancement of the technologies involved and assuming an adequately paced funding program.

Under these ground rules, the following listing represents certain long-range objectives of the U.S. space exploration program.

Relief to Small Businessmen

OF
HON. SAMUEL N. FRIEDEL
OF MARYLAND
Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, the problem of maintaining an economic climate in which small business can survive is ever present. Because of the downward trend of small business during the past several years, it is indeed refreshing to know that one of our distinguished colleagues, the Honorable JAMES ROOSEVELT, of California, has taken up the cudgels on behalf of over 200,000 small businessmen who earn a precarious livelihood from their long hours of toil in gasoline service stations.

On June 28, 1960, Representative ROOSEVELT appeared before the Subcommittee on Commerce and Finance of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and presented in his usual eloquent style a most logical and persuasive argument on behalf of H.R. 9894. Because of the importance of this subject and also to give that statement wider publicity, I request leave that it be inserted in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Congressman ROOSEVELT's statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES ROOSEVELT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON COMMERCE AND FINANCE OF THE INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE COMMITTEE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 28, 1960, IN SUPPORT OF H.R. 9894 WHICH WOULD PROHIBIT GASOLINE PRODUCERS TO ACT AS AGENTS FOR, OR TO RECEIVE COMMISSIONS ON, THE SALE OF TBA ITEMS

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, it gives me great pleasure to appear before your subcommittee this morning. As you no doubt know, I have the honor of being chairman of the Subcommittee on Distribution Problems Affecting Small Business of the House Small Business Committee. That committee being a select committee has, consequently, no jurisdiction to pass on legislation, but concerns itself primarily with investigations and the making of recommendations to appropriate legislative committees, such as yours.

Early this year, I introduced in the House H.R. 9894, a bill which is designed to obviate the deleterious effects of certain practices in the distribution of motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies which tend to cause destructive and unfair methods of competition, thereby adversely affecting commerce. This measure was introduced by me as a result of 5 years of careful study and investigation by the subcommittee of the House Small Business Committee.

This measure simply provides that no producer who sells gasoline at wholesale for ultimate resale at retail, shall act as agent for or receive any commission because of the sale of any product of any manufacturer or distributor of motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, or supplies (TBA).

In the interest of clarification, I should like to point out that this bill—H.R. 9894—is not a divorcement bill to which, perhaps, certain segments of the industry might take exception. Nor would it prohibit any producer or affiliate not engaged in selling motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, or supplies at wholesale for ultimate resale at retail, from selling any of such merchandise directly to consumers at retail and profiting therefrom.

During the 84th Congress, the House Small Business Committee issued its report (H. Rept. 1423) in which its subcommittee found that the small gasoline service station operator "needs immediate and permanent relief to enable him to fulfill his role as an independent businessman. The present laws, procedures, and enforcement policies are inadequate to achieve effective and permanent relief."

That recommendation was reached as a result of voluminous testimony heard during 1955 by the subcommittee. It reached the conclusion that the freedom of choice of the retail dealer, with respect to the manner in which he operates his station, is circumscribed by the economic power of his oil company supplier, whether or not such power is specifically exercised against him. The subcommittee further found that coercive and discriminatory practices against retail gasoline station operators by certain of their oil company suppliers was quite prevalent. This was especially so with respect to tires, batteries, and accessories (TBA).

Further hearings were held in 1956, which gave the subcommittee additional cumulative evidence of unfair practices which made the lot of the small businessman in the industry hard indeed.

Most petroleum companies own or control gasoline service stations which they lease to others on a short-term basis. Through the oil corporations' power to cancel, or refuse to renew such leases arbitrarily, such gasoline producers are able to prevail upon the persons leasing such gasoline service stations to accept the profit margins set by the producer, to conduct their businesses as directed by the producer, and to sell only the motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies, and other products chosen or sponsored by the petroleum company.

Two years later, during the 85th Congress, the subcommittee, as a result of a continuing stream of complaints received from small service station operators, conducted another investigation and held hearings in Washington, D.C.; Denver, Colo.; Los Angeles, Calif.; and Chicago, Ill. During the course of these hearings, it became crystal clear from the testimony that employees of some of the major petroleum suppliers continued to exercise unfair pressure toward their lessees and other dealers in regard to the sale of TBA items.

One of the findings of the subcommittee in 1957, in its House Report No. 1157, was to the effect that "the extent to which small business distributors and retailers of petroleum products are truly free and independent is severely limited by their awareness that their suppliers can wield great economic power."

The experience of the subcommittee in investigating the problems of the lessee-dealers of petroleum products at the retail level through service stations and the continuing flood of letters that it received in regard to alleged coercive and unfair trade practices on the part of certain of the petroleum suppliers, demonstrated the need for further investigation. Therefore, in 1959, additional public hearings were held which were devoted to the problems flowing from the distribution of TBA items and other related automotive products handled by retail gasoline service station dealers and by wholesalers. During those hearings many witnesses, who were representatives of the retail and wholesale segments of the industry and who came from every section of the United States, testified. These witnesses made charges against certain petroleum companies—charges that those companies, through pressure and through coercive means—forced and compelled its retail gasoline dealers to handle only those TBA items in their stations which were sponsored by the petroleum companies.

Actually 35 companies were named by the witnesses at those hearings last year and in the subcommittee's desire to be eminently fair, it gave the petroleum companies an opportunity to present their rebuttal to the charges made against them. Each of these companies were invited to appear at a subsequent public hearing which was held during April 1960, to answer the charges which were made against them, if they so desired.

We found that while 35 petroleum companies were named, 4 of these firms were merged with other named companies, so actually there were 31 invitations to appear; 22 companies replied to the letter of invitation—9 did not; 13 companies said, in effect, that they did not consider the charges made against their companies as something that required an appearance of witnesses on their behalf. Some of those 13 companies submitted affidavits challenging certain charges that were made in December, and other companies set forth in their letters of response unsworn statements denying certain other charges that had been made.

During the hearings, spokesmen for certain petroleum companies testified that it was the announced policy of their firms to permit their retail dealers a so-called freedom of choice respecting TBA items. However, upon further questioning by members of the subcommittee, it was ascertained that the companies' sales representatives were under certain quotas to sell such TBA items, which quotas were based on what the petroleum companies thought that their retail dealers ought to buy and what the maximum potentials of such dealers are. It is but natural to expect that these sales representatives would do their best to reach their expected quotas and utilize any means they deem appropriate to push their company's sponsored TBA items. This is true despite statements made by the companies that their retail dealers have a freedom of choice as to what TBA items they may handle. I submit that H.R. 9894 would remedy this and be a solution of the problem.

In this connection, it is worthy of note that the sales representative is the one who contacts the service station operators in connection with lease renewals as well as with the sale of his company's products. An examination of the various leases for such service stations discloses that the matter of the renewal of such leases is optional only with the oil companies. In that respect such agreements are unilateral. Thus, in having the sales representative who regularly calls on the service stations, being at the same time in a position to tell the service station operator that he, the oil company's salesman, could decide whether or not the lease for a service station would or would not be renewed, is indeed a deplorable situation.

From this it can be readily gathered that the operator of a service station is under a tremendous pressure to comply with the demand, whether expressed or implied, of such sales representative that he handle the petroleum company's sponsored TBA items exclusively. Nor should it be forgotten that such small and independent service station operator has what is to him a considerable investment in his business which the petroleum company could wipe out with either a cancellation of the lease or through a refusal to renew. It is, therefore, apparent that the dealer operating his station under a lease from the oil company supplier is not in fact independent and is subject to control by the oil company supplier. The freedom of choice of the dealer with respect to the manner in which he operates his station is very much circumscribed by the economic power and might of his oil company supplier whether or not such power is specifically exercised against him.

The tremedous inequality of economic bargaining power between the major oil companies and their small retail service station operators can be gaged from the fact that these corporations rank among the largest and most powerful in the world.

The Fortune Directory of August 1959, which lists the 500 largest industrial corporations in the United States, ranked according to sales, shows the following petroleum companies:

Company	Rank	Sales	Assets
		Thousands	Thousands
Standard Oil (N.J.)	2	$7,543,571	$9,478,693
Socony Mobil Oil	6	2,885,684	3,237,328
Gulf Oil	7	2,769,377	3,430,019
Texaco	9	2,327,939	3,111,527
Standard Oil (Ind.)	14	1,863,990	2,769,317
Shell Oil	18	1,665,989	1,648,271
Standard Oil (Calif.)	19	1,559,160	2,451,069
Sinclair Oil	27	1,190,377	1,499,901
Phillips Petroleum	32	1,066,554	1,515,498
Cities Service	35	1,015,317	1,288,358
Sun Oil	47	721,773	666,927
Continental Oil	60	596,503	619,662
Tidewater Oil	62	552,944	810,731
Atlantic Refining	65	538,110	770,797
Pure Oil	80	473,362	534,966
Union Oil of California	96	408,033	684,558

In this connection we should consider the practically infinitesimal position, economically speaking, of the average gasoline service station operator. The Internal Revenue Service of the U.S. Treasury Department, published in May of this year, statistics of income from the income tax returns filed. I was most forcefully struck by the comparative meagerness of the financial returns of the proprietors of service stations.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue reports that an examination of income tax returns of 206,582 gasoline service stations under sole proprietorships showed they earned a net profit of only $564,154,000. Through a process of simple arithmetic—by dividing one of these numbers into another—one arrives at the figure $2,731, which represents the average net profit derived by a proprietor of a gasoline service station. These figures are the figures supplied by the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. Mind you, only $2,731 net profit for a year's compensation for back-breaking toil through long hours. This figure I submit, gentlemen, in these days of the high cost of living, is pitifully small indeed.

It is small wonder then that the turnover—that is, percentage of transferred and discontinued business—in the service station business is the highest in any principal business classification in our entire economy.

Figures released by the U.S. Department of Commerce during 1959, showed average annual service station turnover of 37 percent for each of the years 1957 and 1958.

It is abundantly clear that the petroleum companies hold the means of economic life or death of countless members of this segment of our small business economy.

It is on behalf of these small people that I appeal for protection against the economic might and power of the major oil companies. While I do not infer necessarily that bigness in itself is a sin, I submit that bigness does often sin. One should not forget that these small and independent operators of gasoline service stations have all their worldly goods invested in their businesses. Is it not natural to assume that these small people would readily bend to the pressure and coercive practices by the big corporations?

It is interesting to note that one of the hearing examiners of the Federal Trade Commission in The Matter of B. F. Goodrich Company and The Texas Company (FTC docket No. 6485), recognized that dealers appearing to testify were under considerable pressure because they were naturally interested in not jeopardizing the renewal of their leases.

The acts and practices of the petroleum suppliers which involve coercion of its dealers are prejudicial to the public interest and have a tendency and capacity to restrict, restrain, or lessen competition in the sale of TBA products and constitute unfair methods of competition and unfair acts and practices in the commerce within the intent and meaning of the antitrust laws.

It is, therefore, the purpose of H.R. 9894 to remove the impediments to the distribution of TBA items in interstate commerce, which impediments arise from the dominance and control of the retail market by producers. This bill is designed to restore true, unfettered, and unsubsidized competition in the distribution of motor vehicle parts, equipment, accessories, and supplies through prohibiting the practices which have led to such impediments.

The antitrust laws are perhaps the most important statutes in the United States Code, and have become a part of the warp and woof of our economic fabric. These laws originated in an era of trusts and combinations, when predatory and monopolistic interests openly sought to control the marketplace by the suppression of competition. In the last analysis, such laws are really conservative enactments to preserve democratic capitalism. It is altogether proper and fitting that committees of both Houses of Congress, from time to time, give their attention to the way and manner in which these important statutes function so that they may be improved and amended in order to better fulfill their objectives.

H.R. 9894 is a logical measure designed to protect free and competitive enterprise. It is intended as a further implementation of the board aims and purposes of the antitrust laws in general. It is a truism that no free society can survive on any foundation other than one which guarantees a maximum of individual enterprise and a minimum of power in the hands of a few. The American tradition emphasizes not only private enterprise, but also competitive enterprise. The antitrust acts constitute both a symbol of this tradition and a significant contribution toward making it effective. All through the history of business enterprise it has been accepted as self-evident that personal and political liberties thrive best in those areas where economic freedom is protected and preserved.

H.R. 9894 is but a means to insure that the free enterprise system in the retail business of gasoline service stations be maintained and that coercive measures on the part of their suppliers be not utilized against such dealers. Therefore, I most earnestly urge that this subcommittee report this bill favorably to the full committee. The need for this legislation is urgent and I sincerely trust the full committee will recommend that this bill be enacted into law.

OF
HON. THOMAS J. DODD
OF CONNECTICUT

Friday, July 1, 1960

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on April 26, 1958, the Honorable MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN, Congressman from the 20th District of Ohio, made a very penetrating and prophetic examination of the realities of Soviet strategy. This address was given at the first annual round-table conference of the Institute of Ethnic Studies at Georgetown University. The conference was attended by scholars and authorities on world affairs from various parts of the United States and other countries of the free world.

The address of Congressman FEIGHAN won the 1959 Vigilant Patriots award given annually by the All-American Conference To Combat Communism.

A short time ago I read the national award winning address given by Congressman FEIGHAN and was impressed with the fact that while it covers an examination of the global conflict, the analysis cuts through complicated problems and issues to arrive at the stark realities which all Americans must understand.

I ask unanimous consent that this address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REALITIES OF SOVIET STRATEGY—WHAT IS BEHIND SOVIET POLICY?

(Address by Representative MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN)

Mr. Chairman, faculty of Georgetown University, the director and staff of the Institute of Ethnic Studies, and distinguished guests, I should like by way of introduction to congratulate the president and the board of governors of Georgetown University for the foresight and leadership they have exercised in the establishment of the institute. I recall the happy circumstances during 1954 under which Georgetown University and its able faculty cooperated with the Select Committee To Investigate Communist Aggression, 83d Congress, in the tremendous task of putting together 17 special reports predicated upon, as I recall it, several tons of historic documents and eyewitness statements given under oath attesting to the nature and the objectives of Communist imperialism. As a member of that select committee, I am privileged to say that without the assistance of Georgetown University much of the information so badly needed to understand the tactics and objectives of world communism would not now be available to the leaders of our Government or to the American people. It is a truism that without the full truth which can come only through a careful and objective examination of all the material available, it is impossible to understand the nature and objectives of communism and accordingly it is impossible to prepare a defense against its further encroachment upon the individual liberties and freedoms of all mankind.

It is fitting that the institute should select as its theme for the first annual roundtable conference the subject—"Nationalism in Our Divided World." By so doing the institute has provided an opportunity for a scholarly examination of the most powerful political movement at work in the world today. In another sense, your deliberations during these 2 days can serve a very useful purpose because nationalism as a worldwide political movement is so little understood here in the United States and elsewhere in the free world. By the wide publication of these deliberations, which I earnestly hope may be done, the basis will be provided for a much needed program of public education.

Unfortunately the grave misunderstandings about the origin and nature of nationalism which has developed in the last 20 years or thereabouts has caused us to confuse positive nationalism with such self-destroying movements as national socialism as epitomized by the dictator Hitler, and so-called national communism, a tactic more recently developed by the Communists as a device for smothering the legitimate national aspirations of subjugated nations.

The topic assigned to me is not an easy one because it calls for an examination of worldwide Russian Communist strategy and an estimate of what lies behind the policy of the Kremlin. I shall approach this assignment by dividing the world arena into four readily understandable parts and then examine Russian-Communist tactics in each of these areas.

The first area to be examined is what I shall call the Russian power orbit which includes the Russian Federated Soviet Socialist Republic some 11 well-defined non-Russian nations forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union, the 5 so-called satellites of Central Europe, Communist China and the Communist occupied areas of Korea, Vietnam, and Germany.

As I see it, the Russian Federated Soviet Socialist Republic is the heartland of a modern-day Russian empire. The non-Russian nations of the Soviet Union are the first line of colonies of this empire. The Central European satellites and Communist China represent the second line of colonies of the empire. The Communist occupied parts of Korea, Vietnam, and Germany are tactical operation centers from which the Russians expect to add at least three more strategic colonies to their empire in the foreseeable future. It is arguable that the Central European satellites and Communist China are more in the nature of dependencies than colonies. However, I believe that an objective examination of the Russian methods of controlling and exploiting these nations reveals them to be more in the nature of colonies than dependencies.

As to the existence of a modern-day Russian empire, there is much less dispute on this vital question than prevailed but a few years ago. The strange alliance of World War II brought the United States and other free nations into a "working relationship" with the Communist dictatorship. The free nations had nothing more in common with the Communists than the common objective of defeating the dictators Hitler and Mussolini, and at the 11th hour of conflict, Tojo, the leader of Japanese imperialism. This strange alliance muted our understanding of world political realities which existed then as now and beclouded the true nature of our partner of necessity, to-wit: the Russian Communists. The events of the conflict caused the leaders of the Soviet Union to be pictured as allies of democracy and defenders of human freedom. At war's end the people of the free world naturally expected that a period of unparalleled tranquillity among nations would quickly develop and that all the war objectives set forth in the Atlantic Charter and the Declaration of Liberated Territories would be accorded to all the people of the world without exception.

The uneasiness of the strange wartime alliance was soon brought to public attention by the provocative and uncooperative attitude of the Russian Communists in the immediate months following the cessation of armed hostilities. The failure of the Russians to honor their firm commitments with respect to the liberated territories by their rigging of rump elections in Poland, Czechosolovakia, Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria brought dismay and anxiety to the leaders of the free world. Communist aggression in Greece and Communist threats against the national integrity of Turkey sounded another alarm. This was followed by the Russian inspired and directed Communist conquest of China. The Berlin blockade and Communist aggression in Korea increased already existing political tensions in the world and served to cause the free nations to develop alliances calculated to prevent further Communist aggression. The Russian-instigated war in Vietnam provided additional evidence that the land conscious Russians had not given up their dream of world empire. These unhappy events caused thinking men to shake off most of the political illusions created during World War II. The cold war has forced us to take a cool look at the cold facts of life as it exists in the world of today.

During the past 5 years there has been an increasing amount of evidence of the colossal failure of communism as a system behind the Russian-imposed Iron and Bamboo Curtains. The Communist camp, since the death of Dictator Stalin, has been faced with the choice of giving up communism as a political and economic method or engaging once again in all its most brutal and inhuman methods in an effort to force an unworkable system upon the many different people of a vastly expanded empire. The present Russian leaders in an effort to avoid making the choice have been compelled to expose the failures of communism as a sort of safety valve for the pent-up feelings of the exploited masses. In these circumstances the beclouded picture of life under communism caused by the events of World War II is day by day becoming clearer. On March 5, 1953, just before the Kremlin announcement of the death of the dictator, Stalin, an illuminating editorial appeared in the Moscow Pravda calling for unity within the ruling class of the Soviet Union. This editorial is marked by a sense of fear and urgency and is highlighted by the following statement:

"The ardent, selfless support which the Soviet Government enjoyed in the difficult years of the war from all peoples of the U.S.S.R.—and above all, the confidence in the Soviet Government displayed by the Great [ethnic] Russian people, the leader among the peoples of our country—was the decisive power which insured for our country the historic victory."

There now should remain little doubt in the minds of students of the problem that the basic driving force behind world communism is Russian imperialism. Communist ideology remains as a psychological weapon which is used by the Russian imperialists in their tactical and propagandistic maneuvers directed at the non-Communist world. I believe that with the passage of time these realities will become more apparent and the small amount of confusion which still remains on this basic question will disappear.

The first task, therefore, which confronts the Russians is that of consolidating their colonies to their empire by a wide variety of control mechanisms and tactics, most of which are administrative, propagandistic, military, economic, and perhaps outstanding, by the use of their secret police. From the geographical point alone one can see the tremendous burdens which are involved. The great distance involved, from the Baltic Sea to the Pacific Ocean, imposes grave problems of administration, communications, and the deployment of military forces in such a manner as to be quickly available to put down any political revolutions such as the Hungarian freedom revolution. Added to this are the political and economic problems which compound the overall problem of internal control and consolidation which now confronts the Russian leaders. Coupled to these problems is the fact that there are, at maximum, only 90 million Russians in the empire—a small minority when one considers the unenviable regard with which they have been held historically by the non-Russians in the empire. This, in my view, explains in large part why the Russians must carry out a constant and unrelenting propaganda effort within their own empire.

Communism has a limited appeal with the present-day Russian empire. Only the new aristocracy spawned by the Russian Communists are fixed to the party. The new aristocracy composes but a small fraction of the total population of the empire. Many of them are the opportunists like one finds in any society who put physical comfort as their primary requirement—the role they play to attain this is immaterial to them. Among these are non-Russians who, like their counterparts in any colonial or dependent area, are willing to carry out the orders and plans of the imperialists, providing their material lot is somewhat better than the exploited masses. Still others are infused with historic Russian chauvinism which is reflected by their desire to play a superior role in the attainment of the dream of world empire, which dates back at least 300 years.

On the other hand, the appeal of nationalism is almost unlimited. The people in the non-Russian nations of the present day Russian empire, certainly no less than the people of Asia and Africa, are attuned to the call of this worldwide political movement. Most of them have known the blessings of free and independent governments in the past. All of them have highly advanced and distinctive cultures, languages, arts, music, folklore, and traditions which are supported by a geographical contiguity which reaches far back in history. The suppression of these national traits by the Russians has fanned the flame of nationalism in all their colonies.

While there are minorities in the proper sense of the term within the Russian Federated Soviet Socialist Republic, it is a grave mistake to refer to the people of the non-Russians nations of the Soviet Union as minorities or nationalities. Even the Russians have stopped referring to them as nationalities and minorities, as was the custom in the Czarist Russian Empire. It will be recalled that on the occasion of the commemoration of the 300th anniversary of the Treaty of Peryaslav in 1954, the Kremlin made many proclamations attesting to the fact that Ukraine and other non-Russian nations of the Soviet Union have the status of independent nations. However, the Russians define this independent status as "national in form and Socialist in substance." Clearly this is no independence at all, but rather a clever device of the imperialists to meet the on-rushing wave of nationalism in the non-Russian nations and a propaganda term calculated to mislead the people in the non-Communist world, particularly those who have recently attained national independence or are today striving for that goal.

While the leaders of the Kremlin talk much about the managerial class, the new intelligentsia and economic goals, in fact, their major attention is address to making constant accommodations to the drive of nationalism. This is attested to in part by the fact that today there are more non-Russians holding membership in the presidium and in the secretariat of the central committee of the Communist Party than at any time during the past 40 years. Last November Khrushchev, in an address marking the 40th anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution, made this revealing statement:

"A powerful, modern industry has been created in all union republics, national group leaders of the working class and intelligentsia have been created and cultures, national in form and Socialist in content, have been widely developed."

These changes did not come from any goodness of the heart on the part of the Russian leaders but rather as a matter of absolute political necessity. Where this trend will eventually lead is a matter which should be given the most careful thought and study by those who believe in the independence of nations and human freedom for all people.

I will not take your time in discussing the powerful trend of the national independence movements in central and north Europe because the case has been made in the public mind by the self-liberating actions of the Poles and the Hungarian Freedom Revolution.

It is my judgment therefore, that the complex internal tactics employed by the Russian leaders are directed at meeting and containing the most powerful force at work within their empire—nationalism.

The second area to be examined is the colonial and dependent areas of the free world. I believe there is general agreement that the African Continent stands as the last remaining colonial area in the free world. The tactics of the Russians directed to the African Continent can be quickly defined as follows:

1. To incite general discontent and disorder among the population at large.

2. To incite the people of the colonial area against the West which is pictured by Communist propaganda as imperialist, colonizers, and exploiters. The United States is singled out in this conection and our desire to lend a helping hand is described by the Russians as "economic imperialism."

3. To stimulate a rapid step-up in the demands for self-government.

4. To train and position cadres of Communist agitators and political commissars whose task it is to seize control of newly independent nations as they emerge from colonial status.

5. To disrupt and retard legitimate efforts of Western nations to train indigenous leaders for responsible and democratic self-government. Without such leadership the rapid emergence from colonial status to independence makes the Nation a vulnerable target for the well-trained cadres of Communist agitators and commissars. So that there shall be no misunderstanding about my meaning in this regard, I point out that there is no justification for any foot dragging on the part of any of the Western nations in hastening the day of independence for all the nations of Africa now in a colonial status.

6. To deny the vast mineral resources of the African Continent to the free enterprise system of economic development. The Russians are well aware that the indigenous leaders have no chance, on their own, of developing these vast resources so as to benefit the African people. Also the Russians do not have the wherewithall, though they are full of rosy promises, to provide what is necessary to bring about a rapid economic advance for the people of Africa. If the Russians are unable to maintain a standard of living for the people in the colonies they have established upon the once free and independent nations since World War II, commensurate with what the people therein have been accustomed to, it is reasonable to ask how they might be expected to help in the economic development of other colonial people? The improbability on this question is multiplied when one understands that the people in the non-Russian colonies of the Russian Empire are day-by-day increasing their demands for the decencies of life.

It is of interest to note that not so long ago the Russian Communists were attacking positive nationalism in Africa by characterizing it as "bourgeois nationalism" and attempting to brand it as a political instrument of the West. Particularly singled out for this treatment was President Tubmann of Liberia. Times have changed, however, and the Russian leaders have been forced to adopt new techniques to meet the increasing threats of nationalism to their dreams of world empire. Today their basic technique is to associate themselves with the rising tide of nationalism in Africa while undertaking measures calculated to capture those political movements and to pervert them into instruments of Russian imperialism. The experience which the Russians have had within their empire and in south and southeast Asia with nationalism taught them that it was a movement which took its strength from the masses of people and therefore could not be defeated by mere propaganda or a head-on political collision.

The third area to be examined is the non-Communist area of Asia and the Near East, particularly the newly independent nations. The political complexion of this entire area has changed since the end of World War II. The colonial empires of the past are no more. In their stead are many independent nations, which today are faced with a variety of internal economic and political problems.

The Russians took unusual steps to associate themselves with the tide of nationalism which swept through Asia during and immediately following the war. The extremes to which they went is best demonstrated by the skillful role played by Ho Chi Minh, an old Comintern agent who, during World War II, took on the disguise of "worker for the national liberation of Vietnam." Through intrigue and propaganda, Ho Chi Minh, an agent of Rusisan imperialism, took over a large part of a legitimate national independence movement in Vietnam and plunged that country into a bloody war which resulted in the present unnatural division of that unhappy land. Similar efforts were made by Russian trained Communists to be in the vanguard of the national liberation movements in Indonesia, the Malay Federation, Cambodia, Laos, and Burma. Even in the Philippines, where the United States had pledged national independence for that country which would come into effect immediately after the war, the Communists attempted to organize armed forces to oppose the establishment of a democratic form of government.

Where the Communists failed to seize control of the national liberation movements they have developed other tactics now directed at the newly independent nations of Asia.

They are:

1. To prevent their orderly and full development as sovereign independent states.

2. To neutralize them in a manner as to isolate them from the stream of progress of civilization. The neutral character which the Russians have been attempting to foist upon these nations is a first step in dragging them into the Russian power bloc.

3. To spread suspicion and disfavor upon the free countries of the West—particularly the United States. The West is pictured by Communist propaganda as "imperialist," "exploiters" and "colonizers"—phrases which have deep meaning to the people of Asia. Little is known by the people in these newly independent countries about either the historic or present-day imperialism and colonial methods of the Russians. This situation is further aggravated by the fact that there is uncertainty in these countries as to just where the United States stands with respect to the rights of nations to national self-determination.

4. To use agitprops to cause internal confusion and dissension—a tactic calculated to prevent bona fide indigenous leaders from stabilizing their countries, developing workable economic progress programs, and cementing national independence of a genuine character. Thus the internal strength necessary to withstand the buffeting and tensions in international affairs caused by Russian actions elsewhere in the world is not developing as rapidly as proven friends of these countries had hoped for.

5. To develop cadres of local Communist commissars for infiltration of the newly independent governments and given time, which the Russians seek by their tactics of confusion and delay, they hope to have a sufficient number of local, trained agents to gain control over the affairs of the newly independent nations.

6. To make gilded promises of economic assistance as a wedge to gain entrance for cadres of so-called technicians and advisers. These so-called technicians and advisers have proven in reality to be skilled Communist agitators. The orderly economic development of these newly independent countries does not fit in with the plans of the Russian Communists. On the other hand economic disorder and stagnation leading to economic dependence on the U.S.S.R. does serve those plans.

In the Near East the Russians have concentrated on the tactic of diverting nationalism into negative and self-destroying channels. There they pose as friends and supporters of the Moslem people despite the fact that one of the largest colonial holdings of the Russians is the former independent Turkestanian Democratic Republic which since 1922 has been subdivided, for purpose of control, into five so-called Soviet Republics. Those are Uzbek, Turkmen, Kirghiz, Tadzhik, and Kazakh. In addition the once free and independent nations of Azerbaijan, North Caucasia and Idel-Ural are now reduced to Russian colonial status. In all, there are well over 30 million Moslem people held within the Russian power bloc.

The Kremlin is now attempting to turn this vulnerability into an asset with an estimated 350 million Moslem people in the Middle East, Africa, south and southeast Asia. Radio Tashkent, located in the heart of old Turkestan, with a powerful radio signal utilizing the major languages and dialects of Asia and Africa, works around the clock spreading the biggest of Communist lies. Neither the United States nor any other free country has a radio signal or program capabilities to even remotely counteract this Russian propaganda campaign. Even Radio Peiping, the organ of the Chinese Communists, is being forced into a secondary position in Asia by the powerful radio signal which emanates from Tashkent. If this situation is allowed to prevail, vast areas of Asia and Africa will, by default, be gravitated into the Russian power bloc.

The fourth area is the free Western World. This is roughly defined by the still free nations of north, west, and south Europe, Great Britain, the Commonwealth countries of Australia and New Zealand, together with the nations of the Western Hemisphere. The tactics directed to this area by the Russian Communists take the following form:

1. To cause confusion among and between the leaders of the free nations. On the foundation of confusion the Communists can and do quickly build dissension and distrust. This tactic is reflected by the recent efforts of the Russians to entice the United States into bilateral discussions as a prelude to another summit meeting. Only a few days ago Gromyko, the Russian Foreign Minister, refused to see the Ambassadors of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France together, and insisted on carrying on separate preparatory discussion with them. To divide and sow distrust between allies is the objective.

2. To disintegrate and fragmentize the free world alliances which to date have stood as a bulwark against the outbreak of world war III. The distinguished American labor leader, George Meany, in a recent public address spotlighted this tactic by the following statement:

"In recent years Soviet expansion has been blocked through the collective defense system of the West and through American superiority in the thermonuclear field. The primary purpose of Soviet foreign policy is to destroy these safeguards of world peace."

3. To strike fear into the hearts of the people of these free and independent nations by the Russian technique of rattling the atomic and hydrogen bombs in such a manner as to suggest that those countries which prepare adequately to defend their national independence and integrity will be marked out by the Russians for early and special treatment. Today's paper, April 26, 1958, reported that Mikoyan heading a trade delegation to Bonn, Germany, made a proposition that if Germany refused to accept missiles and other defense equipment from NATO, the Russians would guarantee that the West Germans would not be treated to atomic and hydrogen bombs in event of conflict. This is only the latest evidence of this tactic.

4. To stimulate negative nationalism or better defined—isolationism—in each country to an extent that the people therein will be deluded into believing that neutralism is a safe haven for them or that their best interests are served in world affairs by going it alone. If the Russians attain this objective in the free Western world they will then proceed to pick off each of these countries, one by one.

5. To create the impression that the people of the world have no other alternative but to make a choice between all-out atomic warfare or peaceful coexistence on terms laid down by the Kremlin. The primary requirement of the leaders of the Kremlin for peaceful coexistence on their terms is now well defined. Those terms have been publicly stated by Khrushchev on many occasions. They call for the recognition of a status quo as it now exists in the world. The loud clamor of the Russians for another summit meeting has for its immediate objective that of forcing the leaders of the West into a formal recognition of the present-day Russian empire. By this maneuver the Russians are calling upon the United States and other free countries to assist them in their ignoble task of enslaving many nations and hundreds of millions of people. This demand now being made by the Russian Communists underscores the urgency of their needs for time to consolidate their empire, time to work out new accommodations within their empire to meet the rising tide of nationalism, and time during which the leaders and people of the non-Communist world will be forced to haul down their defenses and thus become weakened in their determination to exist as free and independent nations.

6. To propagandize all the people of the non-Communist world into believing that all is well behind the Russian Iron Curtain, that the future belongs to communism, and that the Russian drive for world empire cannot be stopped by any nation or coalition of nations. In this respect the present-day occupants of the Kremlin are making skillful use of the propaganda technique which Genghis Khan first demonstrated with devastating effect as his highly organized mounted army moved from east-central Asia westward in a movement that reached the very gates of old Europe. The advance agents of Genghis Khan went into towns and villages several days march in advance of the golden hordes. There they engaged in a whispering campaign advancing a doctrine of military invincibility of the "Great Khan" together with the considerate treatment he extended to all those who took no active part in resisting his military movements westward. This caused whole villages and provinces to submit meekly to the advance of the golden hordes. Promptly thereafter all the men and male children were murdered, the women ravaged, and the entire area plundered of everything holding material value. We can learn a lesson from the psychological strategy of Genghis Khan by understanding that his successors, who now occupy the Kremlin, have borrowed his techniques of psychological warfare and applied them to modern-day conditions in their drive for world empire.

But with all their propaganda the Russian leaders from time to time unwittingly make statements which expose their internal political and economic weaknesses. Only last November in a report to the Supreme Soviet Khrushchev pointed up the lot of the common people of the empire in these words, "We still have unresolved problems and that defects exist and serious difficulties must be overcome * * *." He was referring to an acute housing shortage, the lack of consumer goods and the poor quality and high cost of the limited amount of such goods available to the people. Apparently Khrushchev has found a solution to this problem for himself because he had some very stylish suits and coats made to order in Italy a short while ago.

Since last October the Russians have been taking a great international sleigh ride on their spectacular launching of an earth satellite. There is no doubt this is a considerable accomplishment for a system which is unable to provide a decent way of life for the people it controls. However, I believe it would be a grave error to take this highly sensational accomplishment as evidence that the Russians have achieved a high level of industrial capacity comparable to the United States or that their general level of scientific capability equals that of the free world. Account must be taken of the important part played in the sputnik success by German scientists who were captured or kidnaped by the Russians or otherwise enticed to go to the Soviet Union. Then too, one must take into account the possibility that the Russians needed a spectacular success to draw world attention away from their unattractive record in putting down the Hungarian freedom revolution, which may have caused them to put all their eggs in one attention-catching basket. In any case their spectacular sputnik performance served to wake up the people of the United States to the extent that we quickly thereafter successfully launched three earth satellites of more advanced types which are still circling the world. The last satellite has a life expectancy, as estimated by an eminent scientist, of some 200 years.

Now, turning to the question of what is behind Russian policy, I believe the following conclusions follow logically from the examination of their worldwide tactics:

1. That their goal of world empire remains unchanged.

2. That their serious internal political problems are compelling the Russians to seek another summit conference in order to force the free world to recognize a status quo in the world and to accept an era of peaceful coexistence.

3. The Russians need recognition of a status quo in order to convince the people of the many nations held within their empire that the non-Communist world has deserted them and that there remains no other course open for them but total and final submission to their present colonial status.

4. That the Russian plan for peaceful coexistence is a timesaving device which will permit them a breathing spell during which they will seek to make new accommodations to the rising tide of nationalism within their empire, in Asia, in the Middle East and in Africa. These accommodations will of course seek to smother this natural political movement or pervert it into an instrument of Russian-Communist imperialism.

5. That the Russians are engaged in an all-out effort to fragmentize and finally destroy the free world alliances which have stood firm in a common determination to prevent world war III. The recent declaration of the Russians about ending nuclear bomb tests, immediately after they completed their biggest series of tests, is nothing more than a supporting action to this objective. So long as these alliances of free and independent nations remain prepared to meet and defeat any new power thrust of the Russians the possibilities of a hot war are very slim indeed.

In the face of these realities I cannot resist the temptation of making a few observations on what the non-Communist world could do in these circumstances to advance its own self-interest.

The first is that we should not refuse to enter into a summit meeting with the Russians. We should begin immediately to prepare a new and fresh climate of world opinion for such a meeting. To that end there are a number of meaningful actions which the United States could undertake immediately. Among them I would include:

1. A firm declaration by the President that the United States continues its historic support for the political principle of national self-determination for all people. Such a statement, if properly and fully exploited, would clear away the serious doubts and uncertainties about where we stand on this issue in the critical areas of Asia, Africa, and the Middle East, as well as behind the Russian-imposed Iron and Bamboo Curtains.

2. The United States should take the initiative in convening a conference of the leaders of the free world who, working in concert, should establish a definite date for the independence of each nation on the African continent, and then push ahead rapidly with a program calculated to develop indigenous leaders who will provide responsible and democratic government for the people of each of these nations. Such a step would do much to enhance the cause of free people because it would assure democratic forms of government and at the same time turn the spotlight of world opinion upon the Russian imperialists. Moreover, action of this type would provide incontrovertible evidence of our determination to create a world atmosphere in which the natural right of all nations to national self-determination could be exercised.

3. The President could challenge the Russians to honor the war aims set forth in the Atlantic Charter and the Declaration for the Liberated Territories. Action of this type would quickly expose the basic fallacy of the current Russian demand for a recognition of a status quo as it now exists in the world.

4. The President and Congress could take cooperative action to cause the Voice of America to be in a position where it could effectively counteract the Russian tactic of the big lie which is now being beamed from Radio Tashkent, Radio Moscow, Radio Prague, Radio Peiping, and from other centers within the Russian Empire. There is no valid reason why the Voice of America should not reach the people of all the non-Russian nations of the U.S.S.R. in their native language with programs calculated to cause them to associate their destiny with that of the United States and other free and independent nations. This would be a very inexpensive undertaking compared to the billions of dollars Congress must now provide to keep our Defense Establishment in a state of certain preparedness.

5. Finally, we should take immediate steps to firmly associate the United States with the coming victory of the national independence movements within the present-day Russian Empire. Our failure to take such steps at this critical stage of the worldwide ideological contest will cost us dearly in terms of the historic friendships which our Founding Fathers have earned for us through their Declaration of Independence and our Nation's lifelong opposition to imperialism and colonialism.

SENATE

SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1960

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God, author of liberty, as our Nation comes once more to the birthday of its daring advent among the established governments of the world, may the vivid remembrance of the dark and doubtful days of its beginnings stir the citizens of the Republic to mighty resolves as dangers threaten, more formidable than the founding patriots ever knew. May this latest natal day of the state find in the hearts of all true Americans a vow, registered in heaven, that no sacrifice will be avoided as too costly to defend and preserve our freedoms, as diabolical forces that have not Thee in awe plot their destruction.

And in the shouting and tumult of vast political assemblies just ahead, with all their violent clash of opinion and ambition, may the final decisions be fashioned as the paramount question is prayerfully faced: For the land we all love, what will be the best in the fiery tests that loom ahead?

Grant us unity of purpose as we work and pray for—

The peace that comes of purity
And strength to simple justice due;
For so runs our loyal dream of Thee,
God of our Nation, make it true.
Amen.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WISDOM OF THE RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the wisdom of the Senate in adopting the adjournment resolution for the recess was clearly demonstrated by what happened yesterday to the minimum wage bill. If we were crowding a deadline, it would be very difficult to do anything other than correct the error today; and, Mr. President, to get it corrected today might be a very difficult job. Under the resolution we agreed to, we can now consider the measure in the normal course of procedure and pass the bill a majority of the Senators really want to pass, after deliberate and judicious consideration, and not just act upon a measure we have had sent to us because there is no time to do anything else.

Mr. President, on another subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in spite of the fact we are living in the space age—the age of intercontinental missiles and satellites—agriculture is still the biggest industry in the United States.

American agriculture—the largest and most efficient in the world—is a $46 billion a year operation.

No one will argue with the fact that agriculture is the lifeblood of our American free enterprise system.

Forty percent of our total population live in towns and communities of 5,000 or less, and these 40 percent depend largely on agriculture for their basic incomes, either directly or indirectly.

Agriculture accounts for 14 percent of the entire capital worth of the United States.

Agriculture utilizes one-half as much steel each year as does our automobile industry.

Farmers consume more electric power than do the cities of Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, and Houston, combined, each year.

Farmers use $6 billion worth of containers and packaging material to pack the food they produce each year.

In every sense of the word, agriculture is a tremendous force in our modern-day economy. It is an economic fact of life that when agriculture prospers, our overall economy prospers; and when agriculture suffers, our entire economy lags behind.

Regardless of attempts to gloss over the real facts, agriculture as we have known it is today in a death struggle for survival.

Look at what has happened in the past 10 years:

Our population has increased by 17 percent, but the number of farms has steadily decreased.

The per capita income of the Nation has increased 38 percent since 1950, but net farm income has dropped 15 percent.

These trends cannot continue. They are unmistakable indications of a sick farm economy. If they are allowed to go unchecked, they will spell disaster for agriculture as a way of life in the United States.

Those who would like to cover up our farm problems and tell us everything is rosy are afraid to face reality.

They tell us repeatedly that the problem is simple—that it is a mere matter of producing more than we can consume.

They tell us the solution is a mere matter of giving the farmer his freedom—allowing him to produce what he wants—and letting prices fall where they may. Sooner or later—we are told—supply and demand will adjust to each other and everything will be just fine.

That sounds beautiful—but they dare not tell us the main part of the story.

They do not mention the number of farm foreclosures that go with such a scheme, or the number of farm families forced on relief. They do not tell us what happens to the rest of our economy when farmers lose their purchasing power.

I do not believe there is any simple solution. I do not think there is any magic answer.

Agriculture has been going downhill, day by day, for the past 8 years. It will take a great deal of hard work and the best brains we have, to find the answers. The answers will not be found in pretty phrases, wide smiles, and political trickery.

The answer will be found when—and only when—we make up our minds that once again we are going to make the family-size farm a place where average, normal American families can earn a decent and respectable livelihood.

We have been given too much small talk about bigness in agriculture, about the corporation approach to farming.

I never have thought a man had to be a big farmer, to be a good farmer. Certainly the size of an economical operating unit has increased with mechanization, but nobody should be required to own half a county, to make a living farming.

With a surplus of small talk about bigness; our farm program has been geared to the accommodations of the large farm operators, since 1953. It has been the old trickle-down philosophy of taking care of the big boys—and letting the family-size farm take the hindmost.

The basic aim of any farm program should be to create conditions under which the family-size farm can be operated at a reasonable profit. It should be the same basic aim as that which underlies our wage and hour laws—and which underlies tariffs and tax write-offs for business and industry.

The basic aim, the basic purpose, is to give everybody a fair shake, fair chance, and a reasonable opportunity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have an additional 5 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. When we do this for the family size farm, there will be no worries for the plantation owners and corporation farms.

The problem must be approached from many sides.

We know that we have the ability to produce more than we can consume. Warehouses are bursting at the seams with surpluses. The storage costs alone are staggering and a mark of wasted resources. We are blessed with an abundance of all kinds of food and fiber.

And as regrettable as it is, our abundance has become a burden. We are here with more than we can use; yet a large percentage of the world's population goes to bed every night hungry and without enough clothing to keep warm.

The big problem—the first problem we must solve—is one of distribution. We have learned how to split the atom. We have learned how to penetrate outer space. We have learned how to make airplanes that will travel twice the speed of sound. But we have not made it our business to find ways to distribute what we produce on our farms. That is unthinkable, but it is true.

With 8,000 more people sitting down to breakfast each morning in the United States alone, there is no reasonable reason why we cannot make tremendous progress in increasing food and fiber consumption at home.

More important, there is no reasonable reason why we cannot fashion a logical and workable system of distribution of our surpluses to the free nations throughout the world. I firmly believe that our efforts in the Congress to establish a World Food Bank and Food for Peace Program will not continue to be frustrated. In both these proposals we have tremendous potential, but we must have imagination and vision in our foreign policy to translate them into reality.

By increasing consumption at home, and helping fill urgent needs for food and fiber throughout the free world, we would open up new demands and new markets for all our farm commodities.

But this will not just happen. It will take hard work, imagination, and determination.

Removing the burden of our surpluses and increasing consumption are by no means all that must be done.

We will not avoid disaster for agriculture unless we find ways for the farmer to receive reasonable prices for what he produces. Increased demand for his products will help, but it will not do the whole job.

With modern technology, we can make reasonable accurate estimates to our total agricultural production requirements. With determination, we can also hold production in line with our total demands.

I sincerely feel that when farmers agree, through marketing quotas, to keep production in line with demand, they should receive prices which will bring a reasonable return on their investments and their labors.

I have never felt that farmers want or expect handouts or a place at the public trough. But agriculture does deserve just as much protection as the other segments of our economy. I am convinced that if all Government assistance was done away with—to agriculture, to labor, and to business—farmers should be the last to go hungry.

In order to find workable solutions, I firmly believe that two things must be done:

First. We must think in terms of establishing price support and production control programs on a commodity-by-commodity basis. It is impossible for anyone to say—and be fair—that this formula or that formula will solve all of our farm problems. One formula may work for wheat, but it may not be any good for corn or cotton.

Second. Farmers themselves must agree on the kinds of programs that are best for them. We cannot find solutions if one farm organization goes one way and fights all the others. We cannot find solutions until farmers themselves sit down and thrash out their differences and agree on basic approaches.

These are difficult things to accomplish, but they can be done, and they must be done.

I remember very well the conditions we had in agriculture in 1932. After Mr. Roosevelt was elected President—he called the farm leaders of the Nation together at Warm Springs, Ga. There was discord and uncertainty about what to do to stop the wave of farm foreclosures sweeping the Nation.

The President elect told those leaders that there could be no solution in disunity—no answer in conflict. He put them in a room and said he would not let them come out until they had reached an agreement on the best approach to use. They remained there many hours, but they came out together, and the recommendations they made became the foundation for the Federal Farm Credit Administration, the Land Banks, and the Home Loan Bank System, the credit agencies which literally saved thousands and thousands of farm families from bankruptcy during the depression.

I think the time has come when the farm leaders of this Nation must sit down together and recognize the fact that the solutions to our farm income problems are far more important than differences of opinion or pride of authorship.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT AND PAY

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I submit a report on Federal employment and pay for the month of May 1960. NATIONAL WILDERNESS PRESERVATION ACT

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I am about to introduce a bill, and I ask unanimous consent that I may speak on it in excess of the 3 minutes allowed under the order which has been entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORTON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Montana may proceed.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a new National Wilderness Preservation Act incorporating many constructive changes from S. 1123 which I desire to discuss.

When this Congress passed the Multiple-Use Act of 1960—later signed by the President and now Public Law 517—it was gratifying to note how clearly the legislative record of the measure had included careful and favorable consideration of wilderness preservation.

The establishment of a sound and enduring policy and program for the preservation of some of our great American wilderness has been an outstanding conservation concern of this Congress. So also has been the maintenance, the further development, of our excellent multiple-use, sustained-yield policy and program for our national forests. The one is an aspect of the other. It is gratifying to see this recognized.

NEED FOR WILDERNESS LEGISLATION

As we now have, by act of Congress, established multiple use as a basic policy, so we should also now proceed to enact legislation to establish wilderness preservation.

I want to emphasize in this statement that the Multiple-Use Act has prepared the way for such legislation and that for this reason as well as others, we should proceed to enact the wilderness bill.

As a sponsor of the wilderness bill, and as one with a longstanding and deep interest in our national forests, I have observed with special concern, and satisfaction, the way in which the wilderness bill has been respected in these multiple-use bill deliberations.

This was notably evident, in the discussions in the Agriculture and Forestry Committee. No Senator on that committee, I was told, spoke in any opposition to the wilderness bill. Rather, a number of the Senators spoke in its favor.

There was an outspoken consensus that the multiple use measure should be handled in such a way as to avoid any ill effects on the wilderness bill.

A press release of June 17, 1960, from the Department of Agriculture hails the Multiple-Use Act—properly, I believe—as "one of the most important pieces of national forest legislation in the last 50 years."

The Department's release also notes that this is "the first law to recognize wildernesses which are established in national forests by order of the Secretary of Agriculture." It emphasizes that this Multiple-Use Act—and I am again quoting the statement directly—"is not a substitute for wilderness bills pending in Congress and which the Department supports in principle." That ends the quotation from the Department of Agriculture.

WILDERNESS BILL OPPONENTS

I have been warned that opponents of wilderness legislation will now say that the wilderness bill is no longer necessary because the Multiple-Use Act has provided for the establishment and maintenance of wilderness areas in the national forests. It may be true that they will argue in this way, but their argument will not be valid, and I wish to demonstrate clearly that such an argument is not in accordance with the legislative record of the Multiple-Use Act.

Incidentally, I am convinced that from now on we can be confident that the only serious opponents of the wilderness bill are those who will object to any preservation of wilderness that they think might interfere, even at some uncertain future time, with their own interests in exploiting such preserves for profit.

The valid objections of those who have agreed that we should save some of our American wilderness yet have insisted first that we take care to protect other interests too—these objections have been met in a most agreeable manner by advocates of the wilderness bill. The advocates of the wilderness bill, I may say, are among the most reasonable proponents of legislation that I have known.

Great care has likewise been taken to clarify the wilderness bill, avoiding any inadvertent inequities, any misunderstandings.

Of course we cannot expect everyone to agree with any program—certainly not with one that is as fundamental as this undertaking for wilderness preservation.

We can respect any such minority of opposition in our democratic society. We can even endeavor—as we have been endeavoring—to adapt our program to the conditions of such a minority.

But when we have done this—as we have indeed done it with the wilderness bill—and are aware that we are acting in the public interest with demonstrated public support, we should move forward and not allow minority opposition to frustrate further our undertaking.

MULTIPLE-USE BILL RECORD IN THE HOUSE

The Multiple-Use Act has prepared the way for thus moving ahead with the wilderness bill.

When the House of Representatives passed the multiple-use bill, the discussion on the floor included several references to the wilderness-preservation use of the national forests. Representative CATHERINE MAY, of Washington, spoke of the "14 million acres devoted to wilderness-type use in our national forests" and commented that:

> These wild or primitive type areas have been set aside as the best use for the land and its inherent scenic values.

Representative HAROLD D. COOLEY, of North Carolina, the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, who handled the multiple use bill at the time of its passage, offered a wilderness amendment that was adopted. It said:

> The establishment and maintenance of areas of wilderness are consistent with the purposes and provisions of this act.

Representative COOLEY concluded a brief explanation of this wilderness addition to the bill with an important paragraph explaining that this explicit statement in the Multiple-Use Act does not "change the situation as to wilderness areas." In other words, although the Multiple-Use Act clearly includes wilderness preservation as an aspect of national forest multiple-use administration, it does not change the situation which the wilderness bill is designed to improve. Representative COOLEY said of the multiple-use measure:

> Enactment of this bill would not change the situation as to wilderness areas. The Secretary of Agriculture would continue the practice of 35 years' standing of managing areas designated for wilderness-type uses. The status of such areas would remain the same as before. This bill would leave unchanged the procedures with respect to the designation and administration of such areas.

Three other Representatives commented on wilderness during the floor discussion on the multiple-use bill in the House—all of them sponsors of the wilderness bill—JOHN P. SAYLOR, of Pennsylvania, and JEFFERY COHELAN and CLEM MILLER, of California.

Representative COHELAN supported the wilderness sentence addition to the bill. He interpreted this as meaning that "'wilderness' is a multiple use equal in status to commercial uses." He pointed out also that "this new language does not in any way preclude later action on a separate wilderness bill."

Representative CLEM MILLER made an emphatic statement in a paragraph which I shall quote in full. Mr. MILLER said:

> I believe the sentence concerning wilderness areas which has been added to section 2 is a significant contribution. I understand it as a statement of policy that wilderness is a multiple use with stature equal to the commercial uses. I do not believe that action on this bill should or will preclude action on other legislation—the so-called wilderness bill. The problems of how and when wilderness areas are to be established and how to achieve better public control will remain to be solved. The proposed wilderness bill legislation sets forth in precise terms how these problems and conflicts are to be handled for wilderness areas.

Thus the floor discussion of the multiple-use bill pointed out the compatibility of wilderness preservation among the multiple uses of our national forests, and at the same time it made clear that this measure does not interfere with the wilderness bill.

There were no contrary statements, no questions raised as to these emphases.

The record in the House of Representatives thus prepares very well the way for enactment of the wilderness bill.

MULTIPLE-USE BILL RECORD IN THE SENATE

As in the House of Representatives, so also in the Senate, consideration of the multiple-use bill included careful concern for wilderness preservation and for the pending wilderness bill.

I have already referred to the discussion in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. There was an agreeable consensus, first that wilderness preservation is one of the multiple uses of our national forests; and, second, that the multiple-use legislation should not interfere with the wilderness bill.

On that occasion—it was May 18, 1960—the Agriculture Committee adopted an amendment which added a sentence at the end of the multiple-use bill's section 2. This was the sentence that Representative HAROLD D. COOLEY later offered in the House of Representatives, when the House considered the multiple-use bill—on June 2, 1960—and adopted the amendments that the Senate committee had adopted on May 18. I have already quoted the sentence but shall repeat it here for the sake of clarity. This sentence—now a part of the act—reads as follows:

> The establishment and maintenance of areas of wilderness are consistent with the purposes and provisions of this act.

On May 18, 1960, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, following its discussion of the importance of seeing that the multiple-use measure does not interfere with the wilderness bill, also voted to make a declaration to this effect in its report to the Senate on the multiple-use bill. The committee included the following sentence in the report:

> The enactment of this measure is not considered by this committee as a substitute for proposed legislation now pending before another committee to establish a national wilderness preservation policy and program—the so-called wilderness bill.

At an earlier meeting the Agriculture Committee had confronted the question of the multiple-use bill's effect on wilderness preservation and had hesitated. Discussion on this had led to consideration of other matters, notably definitions, and the result had been a decision to consider further and to revise the measure.

On May 18, when the Agriculture Committee had before it the revised measure and had decided on the wilderness additions to the bill itself and to the report, there was no further hesitation. The committee voted to report the bill out favorably. Inclusion of the wilderness language in the bill and in the report had removed obstacles and the measure moved forward.

The Multiple-Use Act was passed by the House on June 2, 1960—with the Senate committee's May 18 amendments. It then came to the floor of the Senate, where it was passed—on June 8, 1960. The discussion on the Senate floor emphasized still further and in more particular detail, first, the compatibility of wilderness preservation among national forest multiple uses; and second, the separate importance of the wilderness bill.

The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE] emphasized greatly the importance of the amendments to the Multiple-Use Act that provide more precise definitions and "in particular," to use his own words, "recognize the wilderness concept as being consistent with, and a part of, the multiple-use principle." Senator McGEE declared, and I am quoting from him, that:

It is these amendments which transform an otherwise simple statute into an important piece of legislation.

The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] and the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], who handled the bill on the floor, clearly established in a colloquy the fact that the Multiple-Use Act does not and cannot take the place of the wilderness bill.

The Senator from Colorado called it "unthinkable" that the multiple-use measure should "establish principles for the establishment of additional wilderness areas." He took care to make clear that the sentence added regarding wilderness "will not be considered as embellishing or widening any of the present policies or laws with regard to wilderness areas," and he introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter addressed to him by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. E. L. Peterson, saying that:

The sentence in section 2 with respect to areas of wilderness would not change existing policy, administrative procedures, or legislative authority. The bill is not intended as a vehicle for the establishment of additional wilderness areas.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] quoted in the course of this colloquy the committee's statement that the multiple-use measure was not a substitute for the wilderness bill. Yet in his explanation of the bill he did include the statement:

Wilderness areas are areas of multiple use and the establishment and maintenance of such areas are completely consistent with the bill.

The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] declared, and I am quoting him, that:

The Agriculture Committee should be commended for its amendment relating to future legislative action on bills relating to the wilderness areas.

And he emphasized that, and I again quote him:

We should make clear that the (multiple-use) bill in no way changes the status of the present wilderness areas.

The senior Senator from Minnesota also on the occasion of the June 8, 1960, discussion here in the Senate emphasized that the wilderness amendment to the multiple-use bill was "vital to this proposed legislation." Senator HUMPHREY said then:

The multiple-use bill takes into consideration legitimate private needs, sustained yield of our forests, and the private enterprise economy, and also gives consideration to the protection of public services, with emphasis upon our wilderness areas.

In fact, the multiple-use measure was viewed "as a step toward more specific wilderness legislation" in a letter that Senator HUMPHREY placed in the RECORD that day addressed to him by the executive secretary of the Wilderness Society, Howard Zahniser. Dr. Zahniser quoted the Agriculture Committee's statement that the multiple-use bill was no substitute for the wilderness bill and pointed out that this declaration had fortified the supporters of the multiple-use measure who are concerned with wilderness preservation.

Dr. Zahniser emphasized that the multiple-use measure, and I quote him, "provides an improved and logical basis for including national forest areas in basic congressional legislation setting forth the definitions, procedures, uses, and other particulars of a national wilderness preservation policy and program."

Thus the entire legislative record of the multiple-use measure as regards wilderness was one of compatibility. It has seemed important to emphasize and review this because it is important to go forward with the wilderness bill.

"MORE SPECIFIC WILDERNESS LEGISLATION"

I, too, have viewed the Multiple-Use Act as a step toward more specific wilderness legislation—as providing an improved and logical basis for legislation to establish a sound and enduring national wilderness policy and to set forth the procedures and other particulars involved in an effective wilderness preservation program.

Such a measure is the wilderness bill. It has been advocated from its earliest introduction as itself a multiple-use measure. It includes a subsection that sets this forth explicitly, a subsection that would itself have established a congressional multiple-use policy for the national forests had the wilderness bill been enacted before the Multiple-Use Act.

This portion of the wilderness bill—subsection (d) of section 1, should now of course be changed in conformity with the Multiple-Use Act, and it is my purpose today to introduce a revised bill containing the necessary change, together with other constructive and acceptable suggestions which have grown out of recent discusions and consideration of the bill.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I have modified section 1(d) to omit all of the sentence after line 18 on page 2 and insert in lieu thereof the words "such units in accordance with the Multiple-Use Act of 1960, Public Law 517 of the 86th Congress." This will make the sentence read as follows:

In establishing thus a National Wilderness Preservation System to include units within the national forests it is further declared to be the policy of Congress to administer such units in accordance with the Multiple-Use Act of 1960, Public Law 517 of the 86th Congress.

Such revision puts the wilderness bill in complete accord with the Multiple-Use Act.

OTHER WILDERNESS BILL AMENDMENTS

As long as it has become necessary to bring the wilderness bill into conformity with this legislation enacted since its introduction, it also seems desirable to incorporate other pending changes. A number of amendments are now before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Their consideration has required considerable time already, and the prospects for finding adequate time for final consideration by the committee have become very discouraging. I have examined these pending amendments and, in consultation with proponents of the wilderness bill, have found many of them acceptable or adaptable and accordingly have incorporated them along with the multiple-use change in a revised bill that can be more readily handled by our committee.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO THE WILDERNESS BILL

Before going further, however, I should like to review briefly what has happened to the wilderness bill since its introduction to this Congress in February of last year.

As many will remember, it had already been the subject of two hearings before our Senate Interior Committee here in Washington and four hearings in the West—at Bend, Oreg., San Francisco, Albuquerque, and Salt Lake City. During the Easter recess last year—1959—there were additional field hearings in Seattle and Phoenix. As a result of these hearings we have had four printed volumes of testimony with a total of more than 2,000 pages.

In this Congress our committee has used the understanding gained through these hearings, through reports from the executive agencies, and in other ways, to clarify and revise the measure. Through committee prints these revisions have been available for study. There have been three such committee prints, and also there has been since April of this year an amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], both of whom are members of the Interior Committee.

Committee Print 3 on February 9 of this year—1960—consolidated various amendments pending in what was considered at that time an instrument for committee action. Action was prevented, however, when the civil rights debate intervened. Since then a number of other amendments have been suggested before the Interior Committee, and the O'Mahoney-Allott proposals have been also before the committee.

It is my purpose today to consolidate the acceptable, rather numerous, detailed amendments into what we might call a clean bill.

Last spring our Committee Print No. 3 was used as the basis for wilderness bills introduced in the House of Representatives. They adopted the amendments proposed in Committee Print No. 3 and have incorporated these in an easily read version.

It is this revised House bill, H.R. 10621, that I am using in analyzing amendments included in the revision I am introducing today.

In addition to the Committee Print No. 3 amendments, the revised House bill includes a change to allay the anxieties of those, especially among our lumbermen, who have feared a never-ending aggressive expansion of wilderness reservations under the wilderness bill procedures. The change provides that after our national wilderness system has been established as outlined in the wilderness bill, any further additions shall be made only by act of Congress.

As those who have followed the consideration of the wilderness bill in Congress will readily recognize, this is a continuation of the patient effort that proponents of the measure have made to meet all acceptable requests for revisions, to meet all reasonable objections, and to spare no effort to clarify.

In addition to the amendments posed in Committee Print No. 3 and the additional change incorporated by sponsors of this revision in the House of Representatives, all the acceptable amendments pending before the committee and a number of the features of the O'Mahoney-Allott substitute proposal are incorporated in this revised bill for convenience in its further consideration.

Likewise, I have incorporated in the measure constructive suggestions made by the distinguished Senator from Washington, Senator JACKSON, who has done a great deal of valuable work in perfecting the bill. As I shall demonstrate with exhibits appended to these remarks there is a strong and insistent public advocacy of the wilderness bill. We should expedite action on it in every way that we can.

ANALYSIS OF CHANGES BEING MADE

The further changes are described in the following listing which I ask unanimous consent to have appear in the RECORD at this point.

For the convenience of any who are concerned with such a reference, I may say that the line references are to the revised House bill I have spoken of, H.R. 10621, introduced on February 23, 1960, by Representative CLEM MILLER, of California.

There being no objection, the revisions and explanations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1 and 2. In the opening sentence of the bill change the word "environment" (line 9) to "character" and delete the words "recreational, scenic, scientific, educational, conservation, and historical (p. 2, lines 2 and 3).

Explanation: These are amendments pending before the Interior Committee. The word "character" is substituted because "environment" might be taken to mean the surroundings of the wilderness rather than the wilderness entity. The deletion of words is in deference to criticism that the phraseology may be subject to various interpretations.

3. In section 1(b) (p. 2, lines 11–17) delete the second sentence: "The preservation of such designated areas of wilderness is recognized as a desirable policy of the Government of the United States of America for the health, welfare, knowledge, and happiness of its citizens of present and future generations, particularly for those uses of such areas that facilitate recreation and the preservation or restoration of health."

Explanation: The deleted language has been criticized as repetitive. This is another amendment pending before the committee.

4. Transfer the present section 1(d) to the end of section 2(a) and strike out all of the first sentence after the first three lines and insert the words "such units in accordance with the Multiple-Use Act of 1960, Public Law 517 of the 86th Congress," making the sentence read as follows: "In establishing thus a National Wilderness Preservation System to include units within the national forests it is further declared to be the policy of Congress to administer such units in accordance with the Multiple-Use Act of 1960, Public Law 517 of the 86th Congress."

Explanation: The transfer is made because the paragraph pertains only to national forest areas and more properly belongs with the subsection dealing with national forest areas. This revision is to bring the bill into accord with the Multiple-Use Act.

5. Reletter section 1(e) to be 1(d) (p. 3, line 23 ff.) and add the following new sentence at the end of the first sentence: "An area of wilderness is further defined to mean an area of undeveloped Federal land without permanent improvements or human habitation which is protected and managed so as to preserve its natural conditions and which (1) generally appears to have been affected primarily by the forces of nature, with the imprint of man's works substantially unnoticeable; (2) has outstanding opportunities for solitude or a rugged, primitive, and unconfined type of outdoor recreation; (3) is of sufficient size as to make practicable its preservation and use in an unimpaired condition; and (4) may also contain ecological, geological, archeological, or other features of scientific, educational, scenic, or historical value."

Explanation: The added detail in the definition of wilderness is in response to requests for additional and more concrete details in defining areas of wilderness.

6. In the first sentence of section 2 (p. 4, line 11) strike the words "if any."

Explanation: This deletion is in conformity with the O'Mahoney-Allott proposal. The deleted words follow the provision that the provisions of the section are "subject to private rights." The deletion removes suspicion that there may be a wish to derogate private rights.

7. Change the first sentence of section 2(a) (p. 4, lines 14 ff.) to read as follows: "The Wilderness System shall include as wilderness areas the areas within the national forests classified on June 30, 1960, by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Chief of the Forest Service as wilderness, wild, primitive, or canoe: Provided, That the areas classified as primitive shall be subject to review as hereinafter provided:"

Explanation: This change adopts a feature of the O'Mahoney-Allott substitute bill incorporating the national forest wilderness, wild, and canoe areas in the Wilderness System at once, leaving the primitive areas for further review. The change is based on the fact that all the national forest areas except the primitive areas have already been subjected to a careful review procedure in their establishment. The primitive areas have not been.

8 and 9. In section 2(a) at the end of the first sentence of the second paragraph (p. 4, line 25) insert the words "and shall report his findings to the President." In the second sentence of this paragraph (p. 5, lines 1 and 2) delete references to the Secretary of Agriculture and make the sentence read: "Before the convening of Congress each year during the said fifteen-year period, the President shall advise * * *" etc.

Explanation: These amendments, both pending before the committee, make clear the right of the President to make his own recommendations and eliminate any possible interpretation that he must forward to Congress the recommendations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

10 and 11. In the second and third sentences of the second paragraph of section 2(a) (p. 5, lines 6 and 14) insert the words "and every" after the word "each."

Explanation: These amendments, before the committee, are to make sure that areas will be separately reported to the Congress and that all will be so reported.

12. Delete the third paragraph of section 2(a) (p. 5, lines 19 ff.).

Explanation: This deletion is in line with amendment 7 and is there explained. This is an O'Mahoney-Allott suggestion.

13. At the end of the fourth paragraph of section 2(a) add the sentence: "Such segregation shall terminate in relation to any unit of public land area upon rejection of the area by the President for submission to Congress as a wilderness area or upon rejection of the area by Congress for addition to the Wilderness System, or five years after the segregation becomes effective, if the lands involved are not included in a wilderness area proposal pending before Congress."

Explanation: This addition is to terminate segregation in a reasonable time and to prevent any unintended use of the segregation provision. This is a clarifying amendment before the committee.

14. At the end of the first paragraph of section 2(c) add the sentence: "Further, during the fifteen-year period following the effective date of this Act the Secretary shall survey any refuges or ranges added to his jurisdiction, to determine if they are, or contain areas that are, suitable for inclusion in the Wilderness System, and shall make such determination and so designate the appropriate refuge, range, or portion thereof, within two years after the refuge or range is added to his jurisdiction."

Explanation: This restores to the text of the so-called House "clean bill" used as the basis for the present revision a deletion apparently inadvertently made from Committee Print 3, but it does this in such a way as to bring it in harmony with the provision that following a 15-year period, wilderness additions will be made only by Congress. This provision is to allay anxieties about indefinite enlargement of the Wilderness System.

15. In the first sentence of section 2(d) (p. 9, lines 16 ff.) change the word "may" in line 16 to "shall also," delete in lines 18 and 19 the words "official or officials authorized to determine the use of the lands involved" and substitute "Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture," and in line 20 delete "any agency of" and substitute "the Department of the Interior or the Department of Agriculture for". In the second sentence of this section (p. 9, line 24 ff.) delete the words "official or officials authorized to determine the use of the areas involved" and substitute "appropriate Secretary."

Explanation: This confines the areas within the Wilderness System to those under the jurisdiction of the Departments of Agriculture and the Interior. The proposed change is pending before the committee and is here incorporated in view of the fact that the areas outside Agriculture and Interior are not many or extensive and it seems prudent to remove the objection to them. The bill was originally drafted to make it possible for agencies in addition to Agriculture and Interior to propose the establishment of wilderness areas, including the Tennessee Valley Authority which holds 733,000 acres of land. The new General Services Administration report on land holdings by agencies shows that Department of Commerce agencies hold 29,000 acres of land; Justice (Bureau of Prisons), 22,000 acres; Treasury (Coast Guard), 26,000 acres; General Services Administration, 14,000; Veterans' Administration, 36,000; Atomic Energy Commission, 1.7 million; Army, 7.4 million; Corps of Engineers, 4.4 million; and International Boundary and Water Commission, United States-Mexico, 80,000 acres. Under the original language of the bill, any of these agencies, if they hold a tract they felt desirable for wilderness, could propose to the President and the President could propose to Congress, its designation as wilderness. Under the amendments suggested, the authority to make proposals would be limited to the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, therefore, only the lands under their jurisdiction.

16. At the end of the second sentence of section 2(d) (p. 10, line 6) change the period to a semicolon and add "Provided, That segregation shall terminate in relation to any unit of public land area upon rejection of the area by the President for submission to Congress as a wilderness area or upon rejection of the area by Congress for addition to the Wilderness System, or five years after the segregation becomes effective, if the lands involved are not included in a wilderness area proposal pending before Congress."

Explanation: This is for the same purpose as amendment 13. Apparently the inclusion here has so far been inadvertently overlooked.

17. In the third sentence of section 2(d) (p. 10, line 10) before the last word insert "such conditions as may be included in, and accepted with, such".

Explanation: This is a clarifying amendment providing for concurrence "with such agreements as shall be made at the time of such gift, or such conditions as may be included in, and accepted with, such bequest."

18. From the first sentence of section 2(e) (p. 10, lines 17 ff.) delete the words "modification of, or"; following the word "addition" (in line 20) add "to any such area of wilderness or"; change the word "enactment" date to "effective" date; and at the end of the sentence delete the words "of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, or other official or officials having jurisdiction over the land involved" and add the word "appropriate" Secretary.

Explanation: These are clarifying amendments. The last one brings this section into harmony with the amended section 2(d).

19. At the end of section 2(e) (p. 11, line 20) add: "A concurrent resolution of rejection shall be handled in accordance with the procedures of title II of the Reorganization Act of 1949 (63 Stat. 206–207; secs. 203–206)."

Explanation: This is a clarifying amendment pending before the committee.

20. Make the added section 2(f) (p. 10) read as follows: "Later additions to Wilderness System or areas.—(f) Additions to any wilderness area or to the Wilderness System after the fifteen-year period following the effective date of this Act shall be made only by Act of Congress."

Explanation: This subsection is an amendment to Committee Print No. 3 added in the House "clean bill" to allay anxieties regarding indefinite enlargement of the Wilderness System.

21. In the first sentence of section 3(b) (p. 12, line 17) after the phrase "existing private rights" delete the parenthetical words "(if any)."

Explanation: This deletion is in conformity with the O'Mahoney-Allott proposal, and is for the same purpose as amendment No. 6.

22. At the end of the first sentence of section 3(b) delete the words "not contemplated in the purposes of this Act," and substitute "Provided, That establishments outside the wilderness areas, including establishments within areas of the National Park System designated for accommodations for visitors in accordance with section 2(b) of this Act, may perform their services within areas of wilderness in connection with such activities as are proper for realizing the recreational or other purposes of this Act, including guide services and the provision of horses, equipment, or other essentials for use of the area as wilderness."

Explanation: This is a clarifying amendment adapted from the O'Mahoney-Allott substitute bill.

23. At the end of section 3(b) (p. 13, line 4) add "including such measures as may be required in emergencies involving the health and safety of persons within such areas."

Explanation: This is a clarifying amendment adapted from the O'Mahoney-Allott substitute bill.

24 and 25. In section 3(c)(2) after the word "prospecting" (p. 13, line 20) add the parenthesis "(including exploration for oil and gas)" and after the word "mining" (line 21) add the parenthesis "(including the production of oil and gas)."

Explanation: These are clarifying amendments adapted from the O'Mahoney-Allott substitute bill.

26. In section 3(c)(3) (p. 14, lines 18 ff.) following the references to public laws insert the appropriate parentheses "(46 Stat. 1020)," "(62 Stat. 568)," and "(70 Stat. 326)."

Explanation: These insertions remedy inadvertent omissions.

27. At the end of section 3(c) add a further paragraph 6 as follows:

"(6) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the several States with respect to wildlife and fish in the national forests."

Explanation: This is an amendment similar to one made to the Multiple-Use Act and one that is here intended to meet the need envisioned in a provision of the O'Mahoney-Allott substitute bill regarding hunting and fishing, doing this in a way that avoids recognized difficulties in that language.

THE BILL IN REVISED FORM

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, incorporating these revisions and thus in every way possible meeting the pending suggestions and objections, I wish now to introduce the wilderness bill in revised form for reference to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this wilderness bill in revised form (S. 3809) be printed in full at this place in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3809) to establish a National Wilderness Preservation System for the permament good of the whole people, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) in order to secure for the American people of present and future generations the benefits of an enduring resource of wilderness, there is hereby established a National Wilderness Preservation System to be composed of federally owned areas in the United States and its territories and possessions as hereinafter provided, retaining their primeval character and influence and being managed for purposes consistent with their continued preservation as wilderness, for the public purposes of use and enjoyment by the people in such manner as will leave them unimpaired for future use and enjoyment as wilderness.

(b) The Congress recognizes that an increasing population, accompanied by expanding settlement and growing mechanization, is destined to occupy and modify all areas within the United States, its territories, and possessions except those that are designated for preservation and protection in their natural condition.

(c) It is accordingly declared to be the policy of Congress (1) to secure the dedication of an adequate system of areas of wilderness and (2) to provide for the protection of these areas and for the gathering and dissemination of information regarding their use and enjoyment as wilderness. It is pursuant to this policy that the National Wilderness Preservation System is established. Subject to the provisions of this Act, units of this System shall be so protected and administered as to preserve their wilderness character.

(d) A wilderness, in contrast with those areas where man and his own works dominate the landscape, is hereby recognized as an area where the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a visitor who does not remain. An area of wilderness is further defined to mean an area of undeveloped Federal land without permanent improvements or human habitation which is protected and managed so as to preserve its natural conditions and which (1) generally appears to have been affected primarily by the forces of nature, with the imprint of man's works substantially unnoticeable; (2) has outstanding opportunities for solitude or a rugged, primitive, and unconfined type of outdoor recreation; (3) is of sufficient size as to make practicable its preservation and use in an unimpaired condition, and (4) may also contain ecological, geological, archeological, or other features of scientific, educational, scenic, or historical value. For the purposes of this Act wilderness shall include the areas provided for in section 2 of this Act and such other areas as shall be designated for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

NATIONAL WILDERNESS PRESERVATION SYSTEM

SEC. 2. The National Wilderness Preservation System (hereinafter referred to in this Act as the Wilderness System) shall comprise (subject to existing private rights) the federally owned areas provided for in this section.

NATIONAL FOREST AREAS

(a) The Wilderness System shall include as wilderness areas the areas within the national forests classified on June 30, 1960, by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Chief of the Forest Service as wilderness, wild, primitive, or canoe: Provided, That the areas classified as primitive shall be subject to review as hereinafter provided:

Following enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall, within fifteen years, review, in accordance with paragraph C, section 251.20, of the Code of Federal Regulations, title 36, effective January 1, 1959, the suitability of each primitive area in the national forests for preservation as wilderness and shall report his findings to the President. Before the convening of Congress each year during the said fifteen-year period, the President shall advise the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives of his recommendation for the inclusion and designation as wilderness area, or exclusion from the Wilderness System, of each and every area on which review has been completed in the preceding year, together with maps and definition of boundaries: Provided, That the President may alter at the time of such inclusion and designation the boundaries existing on the date of this Act for any primitive area included, to exclude portions not predominantly of wilderness value or to add any adjacent area of national forest lands that are predominantly of wilderness value. The recommendation of the President in respect to each and every area shall become effective at the conclusion of one full and continuous session of Congress after such certification is received by Congress if not rejected by concurrent resolution passed by Congress before the conclusion of the session.

Additional areas for inclusion in the Wilderness System may be designated within national forests by the Secretary of Agriculture during the above said fifteen-year period, after not less than ninety days' public notice and the holding of a public hearing, if there is a demand for such a hearing, and such designations shall take effect as provided in subsection (e) below. The publication of a proposal to add any national forest area or part thereof to the Wilderness System shall segregate the public lands involved from any or all appropriations under the public land laws to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary of Agriculture. Such segregation shall terminate in relation to any unit of public land area upon rejection of the area by the President for submission to Congress as a wilderness area or upon rejection of the area by Congress for addition to the Wilderness System, or five years after the segregation becomes effective, if the lands involved are not included in a wilderness area proposal pending before Congress.

In establishing thus a National Wilderness Preservation System to include units within the national forests it is further declared to be the policy of Congress to administer such units in accordance with the Multiple Use Act of 1960, Public Law 517 of the 86th Congress. Such areas of wilderness like all other national forest land shall be so managed as to protect and preserve the watersheds, the soil, the beneficial forest and timber growth, and all beneficial vegetative cover. The purposes of this Act are further declared to be within and supplemental to but not in interference with the purposes for which national forests are established as set forth in the Act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat. 34, 35, 36; 16 U.S.C. 471–78, 551).

NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM AREAS

(b) At the times, in the manner, and with the exceptions hereinafter provided for, the Wilderness System shall include each park and monument in the National Park System on the effective date of this Act embracing a continuous area of five thousand acres or more without roads, and such additional units of the National Park System as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

Not later than ten years after the date of this Act, or within two years after a unit has been prescribed for addition to the Wilderness System, whichever is later, and subsequently as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine to be necessary in the public interest, the Secretary of the Interior shall, ninety days after giving public notice in accordance with section 4 of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 238; 5 U.S.C. 1003), designate within each unit of the National Park System to be included in the Wilderness System such area or areas as he shall determine to be required for roads, motor trails, buildings, accommodations for visitors, and administrative installations. Each such unit, with the exception of the particular area or areas determined to be required for the aforesaid purposes, shall become a part of the Wilderness System when the designation of such area or areas has been made within that unit, and as provided in subsection (e) below.

No designation of an area for roads, motor trails, buildings, accommodations for visitors, or administrative installations shall modify or affect the application to that area of the provisions of the Act approved August 25, 1916, entitled "An Act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes" (39 Stat. 535, as amended; 16 U.S.C. 1 and the following). The accommodations and installations in such designated areas shall be incident to the conservation and use and enjoyment of the scenery and the natural and historical objects and flora and fauna of the park or monument in its natural condition. Further, the inclusion of any National Park System area within the Wilderness System pursuant to this Act shall in no manner lower the standards evolved for the use and preservation of such National Park System areas in accordance with the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535, as amended; 16 U.S.C., 1952 edition, sec. 1 and the following), the statutory authority under which the area was created, or any other Act of Congress which might pertain to or affect such National Park System area, including but not limited to, the Act of June 8, 1906 (34 Stat. 225; 16 U.S.C., 1952 edition, sec. 432 and the following), the provisions of title 16, United States Code, 1952 edition, section 796; and the Act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666; 16 U.S.C., 1952 edition, sec. 461 and the following).

NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGES AND RANGES

(c) The Wilderness System shall include such wildlife refuges and game ranges, or portions thereof, as the Secretary of the Interior shall designate. Within five years after the date of this Act the Secretary shall survey the refuges and ranges under his jurisdiction on the effective date of this Act, and designate for inclusion in the Wilderness System those refuges and ranges, or portions thereof, that he determines to be appropriate. Further, during the fifteen-year period following the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall survey any refuges or ranges added to his jurisdiction. to determine if they are, or contain areas that are, suitable for inclusion in the Wilderness System, and shall make such determination and so designate the appropriate refuge, range, or portion thereof, within two years after the refuge or range is added to his jurisdiction.

Within two years after the designation of any refuge or range in its entirety, and subsequently as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine to be necessary in the public interest, and ninety days after giving public notice in accordance with section 4, Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 238; 5 U.S.C. 1003), the Secretary of the Interior shall designate within such refuge or range such area or areas as he shall determine to be required for roads and buildings and other installations for administration and protection of the wildlife, which area or areas shall be excluded from the Wilderness System. Designations made in accordance with the provisions of this subsection shall take effect as provided in subsection (e) below.

Nothing in this subsection shall authorize the Secretary of the Interior to designate for inclusion in the Wilderness System any area of national forest or other land under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

OTHER UNITS

(d) The Wilderness System shall also include such units as may be designated within any federally owned areas by the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, including any area or areas acquired by gift or bequest by the Department of the Interior or the Department of Agriculture for the Federal Government for preservation as wilderness. The designation of, addition to, or modification or elimination of, such units shall be in accordance with regulations that shall be established in conformity with the purposes of this Act by the appropriate Secretary, including but not limited to, provisions for segregating any public lands involved from any or all forms of appropriation under the public-lands laws pending addition of such units to the Wilderness System, and shall take effect as provided in subsection (e) below: Provided, That segregation shall terminate in relation to any unit of public land area upon rejection of the area by the President for submission to Congress as a wilderness area or upon rejection of the area by Congress for addition to the Wilderness System, or five years after the segregation becomes effective, if the lands involved are not included in a wilderness area proposal pending before Congress. Regulations with regard to any privately owned area given or bequeathed to a Federal agency for preservation as wilderness shall be in accordance with such agreements as shall be made at the time of such gift, or such conditions as may be included in, and accepted with, such bequest. Within federally owned areas included in the Wilderness System under this subsection the grazing of livestock where well established at the time of such designation may be permitted to continue subject to regulations deemed desirable by the official or officials authorized to determine the use of the areas involved.

ADDITIONS, MODIFICATIONS, AND ELIMINATIONS

(e) Any proposed elimination from any area of wilderness established in accordance with this Act, or any proposed elimination of any unit from the Wilderness System, and any proposed addition to any such area of wilderness or to the Wilderness System during the fifteen-year period following the effective date of this Act, shall be made only after not less than ninety days' public notice and the holding of a public hearing, if there is a demand for such a hearing, and shall be reported with map and description to the President by the appropriate Secretary. The President shall transmit the proposal to Congress as he deems appropriate, and his recommendation shall take effect upon the expiration of the first full and continuous session of Congress, following the date on which the report is received by Congress; but only if during this period there has not been passed by Congress a concurrent resolution opposing such proposed modification, or elimination: Provided, That nothing in this Act shall restrict or affect the authority of officials of the United States, acting pursuant to other law, to establish in the manner prescribed by such law, areas of the National Park System, or to make additions, modifications, or eliminations from any area of such National Park System pursuant to such authority. Within any unit of the Wilderness System the acquisition of any privately owned lands is hereby authorized, and such sums as the Congress may approve for such acquisition are hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

A concurrent resolution of rejection shall be handled in accordance with the procedures of title II of the Reorganization Act of 1949 (63 Stat. 206–207; section 203–206).

LATER ADDITIONS TO WILDERNESS SYSTEM

(f) Additions to any wilderness area or to the Wilderness System after the fifteen-year period following the effective date of this Act shall be made only by Act of Congress.

USE OF THE WILDERNESS

SEC. 3. (a) Nothing in this Act shall be interpreted as interfering with the purposes stated in the establishment of or pertaining to any national park or monument, national forest, national wildlife refuge, or other area involved, except that any agency administering any area within the Wilderness System shall be responsible for preserving the wilderness character of the area and shall so administer such area for such other purposes as also to preserve its wilderness character. The Wilderness System shall be devoted to the public purposes of recreational, scenic, scientific, educational, conservation, and historical use. Subject to the provisions of this Act, all such use shall be in harmony, both in kind and degree, with the wilderness environment and with its preservation.

(b) Except as specially provided in this section, and subject to existing private rights, no portion of any area constituting a unit of the Wilderness System shall be used for any form of commercial enterprise: Provided, That establishments outside the wilderness areas, including establishments within areas of the National Park System designated for accommodations for visitors in accordance with section 2(b) of this Act, may perform their services within areas of wilderness in connection with such activities as are proper for realizing the recreational or other purposes of this Act, including guide services and the provision of horses, equipment, or other essentials for use of the area as wilderness. Within such areas, except as otherwise provided in this section and in section 2 of this Act, there shall be no permanent road; nor shall there be any use of motor vehicles, motorized equipment, or motorboats, or landing of aircraft, nor any other mechanical transport or delivery of persons or supplies, nor any temporary road, nor any structure or installation, in excess of the minimum required for the administration of the area for the purposes of this Act, including such measures as may be required in emergencies involving the health and safety of persons within such areas.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS

(c) The following special provisions are hereby made:

(1) Within national forest areas included in the Wilderness System grazing of livestock and the use of aircraft or motorboats where these practices have already become well established may be permitted to continue subject to such restrictions as the Secretary of Agriculture deems desirable. Within national forest areas included in the Wilderness System such measures may be taken as may be necessary in the control of insects and diseases, subject to such conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture deems desirable.

(2) Within national forest areas included in the Wilderness System and in federally owned areas included in the Wilderness System under section 2(d) of this Act, the President may, within a specific area and in accordance with such regulations as he may deem desirable, authorize prospecting (including exploration for oil and gas), mining (including the production of oil and gas), and the establishment and maintenance of reservoirs, water-conservation works, and other facilities needed in the public interest, including the road construction and maintenance essential to development and use thereof, upon his determination that such use or uses in the specific area will better serve the interests of the United States and the people thereof than will its denial.

(3) Other provisions of this Act to the contrary notwithstanding, the management of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, formerly designated as the Superior, Little Indian Sioux, and Caribou roadless areas in the Superior National Forest, Minnesota, shall be in accordance with regulations established by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the general purpose of maintaining, without unnecessary restrictions on other uses, including that of timber, the primitive character of the area, particularly in the vicinity of lakes, streams, and portages: Provided, That nothing in this Act shall preclude the continuance within the area of any already established use of motorboats. Nothing in this Act shall modify the restrictions and provisions of the Shipstead-Nolan Act, Public Law 539, Seventy-first Congress, second session, July 10, 1930 (46 Stat. 1020), the Thye-Blatnik Act, Public Law 733, Eightieth Congress, second session, June 22, 1948 (62 Stat. 568), and the Humphrey-Thye-Blatnik-Andresen Act, Public Law 607, Eighty-fourth Congress, second session, June 22, 1956 (70 Stat. 326), as applying to the Superior National Forest or the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Modifications of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area within the Superior National Forest shall be accomplished in the same manner as provided in section 2 (a) and (e).

(4) Any existing use or form of appropriation authorized or provided for in the Executive order or legislation establishing any national wildlife refuge or range existing on the date of approval of this Act may be continued under such authorization or provision.

(5) Nothing in this Act shall constitute an express or implied claim or denial on the part of the Federal Government as to exemption from State water laws.

(6) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the several States with respect to wildlife and fish in the national forests.

RECORDS AND REPORTS

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall each maintain available to the public records of wilderness areas in their jurisdiction, including maps and descriptions, copies of regulations governing them, copies of public notices of, and reports submitted to Congress regarding pending additions, eliminations, or modifications. At the opening of each session of Congress, the Secretaries shall jointly report to the President for transmission to Congress on the status of the Wilderness System, including a list and description of areas in the System, regulations in effect and other pertinent information, together with any recommendations they may care to make.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture are authorized to accept private contributions and gifts to be used to further the purposes of this Act. Any such contributions or gifts shall, for purposes of Federal income, estate, and gift taxes, be considered a contribution or gift to or for the use of the United States for an exclusively public purpose, and may be deducted as such under the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 subject to all applicable limitations and restrictions contained therein.

SEC. 6. This Act shall be known as the "National Wilderness Preservation Act."

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be followed in the RECORD with exhibits A, B, C, D, and E, as follows:

Exhibit A: A brochure entitled "The Wilderness Bill," issued by Trustees for Conservation and among other matters, briefly summarizing the provisions of the bill and listing selected newspapers that have supported the measure editorially.

Exhibit B: An editorial in the spring 1960 issue of the Living Wilderness entitled "A Basic Concept," pointing out the multiple-use principle as incorporated in the wilderness bill.

Exhibit C: An editorial in the June 1960 issue of National Wildlands News entitled "What About the Multiple-Use Bills?" emphasizing that legislation to assert multiple use is desirable "but it should not be regarded as a substitute for the wilderness bill."

Exhibit E: A selection of recent newspaper editorials supporting the wilderness bill, including a June 27, 1960, editorial from the New York Times, which, appropriately for our purposes today, comments that, and I quote:

While the multiple-use law is acceptable in itself, it ought not be considered—as we fear some of its proponents consider it—as an alternative to, or a diversion from, the various proposals to create new national parks to provide permanent statutory protection for certain unique scenic areas. Nor should it be regarded as lessening in any way the need for the wilderness bill, which has been debated for years and which would establish firm legislative protection—that the multiple-use bill does not establish—for the small remaining areas of primitive wilderness still held in Federal hands.

The editorials in exhibit E are listed as follows:

EXHIBIT A

THE WILDERNESS BILL

(By Trustees for Conservation, San Francisco, Calif., and Washington, D.C.)

Wilderness areas—like museums, art galleries, libraries—are for everybody. They constitute only 2 percent of our land and should be preserved as part of our heritage for all—not exploited by the few people who can profit by destroying them. Let's not let representatives of commercial interests keep us from preserving our few remaining areas.

The wilderness bill has been termed "the most important conservation measure now before Congress."

The New York Times says "it may well come to be considered, along with the Antiquities Act of 1960, the Park Service Act of 1916, and a few other basic laws, part of the Magna Carta of American conservation."

The purpose of the wilderness bill is "to secure for the American people of present and future generations the benefits of an enduring resource of wilderness"—a resource that will "serve public purposes including recreational, scenic, scientific, educational, conservation, and historical use and enjoyment by the people."

WHAT THE WILDERNESS BILL WILL DO

1. Establish a national policy for wilderness preservation and a program to make it effective.

2. Give statutory protection to wilderness areas in national parks and monuments, national forests, and national wildlife refuges and ranges.

3. Establish a National Wilderness Preservation System "for the permanent good of the whole people" to consist of the now-existing wilderness areas in the forests, parks, and refuges.

4. Set up an orderly procedure for additions, deletions, or changes in the Wilderness Preservation System, with provisions for due notice, public hearings, and review by Congress.

WHAT IT WILL NOT DO

1. It will not conflict with established uses of the parks, monuments, forests, or wildlife refuges.

2. It will not interfere with established practices, such as grazing, for example. (It includes no areas now open to lumbering.)

3. It will not endanger existing private rights; it specifically safeguards them.

4. It will not call for money; it merely sets up a system by which existing Federal agencies will preserve wilderness values in the specified areas already under their jurisdiction.

The wilderness bill is an investment for the ages.

WHY THE WILDERNESS BILL IS NEEDED

1. Wilderness now has only administrative protection. There is no national wilderness policy or program prescribed by Congress. Administrators change; their ideas on the composition and values of wilderness differ. One administrator can abolish or seriously reduce wilderness established by another. Administrators are under pressures hard to withstand when there are no congressional guidelines.

2. The wilderness bill would provide the guides and strengthen the hands of the administrators, since it charges administering agencies with responsibility for preserving the wilderness character of wilderness areas in their charge.

3. It authorizes multiple use including wilderness.

4. Congress—representing all the people—should have the decisive voice in stating and carrying out a policy regarding the use of public lands for the benefit of all the people of the Nation.

WHO SUPPORTS THE BILL?

Sponsored in Congress by Senators and Representatives of both parties, westerners and easterners, the wilderness bill has the support of conservation organizations which have long realized the need for a basic national policy, as well as garden clubs, women's organizations, sportsmen's organizations, labor groups, professional people, clergymen, businessmen, housewives, teachers and professors, students, naturalists, scientists, and "just folks." In one hearing there was testimony for wilderness preservation from a sawmill operator who saw greater public value in the forest as a wilderness in that area than in the timber that could be taken out of it.

Among supporters are many prominent individuals, including Ansel Adams, Elliott S. Barker, Guy Emerson, U. S. Grant 3d, Frederick Brown Harris, Paul G. Hoffman, Joseph Wood Krutch, Karl Menninger, Eleanor Roosevelt, Francis B. Sayre, Jr., Adlai E. Stevenson, Wallace Stegner, Edwin Way Teale, G. Mennen Williams.

Twenty-two national and 58 State and other organizations, including AFL–CIO, American Planning and Civic Association, American Nature Association, Citizen's Committee on Natural Resources, Council of Conservationists, Federation of Western Outdoor Clubs, Garden Clubs of America, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Independent Timbermen's Committee, Izaak Walton League, National Audubon Society, National Council of State Garden Clubs, National Parks Association, National Wildlife Federation, Nature Conservancy, New York State Conservation Council, Sierra Club, The Wilderness Society, Trustees for Conservation, Washington State Sportsmen's Council, Wildlife Management Institute.

Many newspapers, in editorials, including Boston Herald, Christian Science Monitor, Hartford Courant, New York Times, Washington Post, Washington Evening Star, Richmond Times-Dispatch, Knoxville News-Sentinel, Nashville Tennessean, Minneapolis Star, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Rock Island Argus, Oklahoma City Times, Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Bend (Oreg.) Bulletin, Eugene Register-Guard, Portland Journal, San Francisco Chronicle, San Francisco Examiner.

The administration, through the Bureau of the Budget, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, has urged prompt approval.

WHAT IS HAPPENING TO THE BILL?

In the Senate the Interior Committee after two hearings in Washington, D.C., and six in the West is now considering the wilderness bill. Senators and staff members have worked out a revision to clarify, modify, and amend it in accordance with criticisms presented. This revision—known as Committe Print 3—has been accepted by wilderness bill advocates. They are urging that it be reported promptly by the committee and passed by the Senate. Substitute bills and amendments advocated by Senator JOSEPH O'MAHONEY and Senator GORDON ALLOTT have been opposed as representing attempts to frustrate and defeat the real purpose and needs of this legislation.

In the House the Interior Committee leadership has agreed to take up the wilderness bill as soon as it is passed by the Senate. This bill will have to be done promptly so the bill can be enacted this year. The bill in its Senate Committee Print 3 form has recently been introduced in the House. Thus the way is being prepared for prompt action that can bring enactment this year.

YOU CAN HELP

You can write your Senators urging them to speed up action on the wilderness bill as revised in Committee Print 3 and asking them to oppose last-minute substitute proposals by those who want to delay and frustrate this much-needed legislation. After 4 years of study it is now time to act. Address: Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

You can urge your Congressman (Address: House Office Building, Washington, D.C.) to support the wilderness bill and do everything he can to insure prompt action. Ask him or her to help see that the House Interior Committee acts promptly so we can get the wilderness bill through this year.

EXHIBIT B

[From the Living Wilderness, spring 1960]

A BASIC CONCEPT

The opening sentence of the wilderness bill's section on "use of wilderness" expresses the essence of a concept that this measure proposes to embody in fundamental law:

"Nothing in this act shall be interpreted as interfering with the purposes stated in the establishment of or pertaining to any national park or monument, national forest, national wildlife refuge, or other area involved, except that any agency administering any area within the wilderness system shall be responsible for preserving the wilderness character of the area and shall so administer such area for such other purposes as also to preserve its wilderness character."

Viewed in one way, this concept is that the preservation of wilderness is not inconsistent with other public purposes served by our national forests, national parks, wildlife refuges, and other areas where wilderness may be preserved. It is consistent with them; it can properly become a part of an overall land-use program that will meet all our needs.

Viewed from the other side, this basic concept is that wilderness may be preserved in areas that can appropriately serve also a variety of other purposes; in other words, a multiplicity of uses. Not only can areas of wilderness be contained within, and administered within, land units that include areas devoted to other uses that likewise are within the overall multiplicity, but also the areas of wilderness themselves can serve a multiplicity of purposes compatible with wilderness protection.

In an early advocacy of this concept in terms of a National Wilderness Preservation System, a spokesman for the Wilderness Society, at the 1955 National Citizens Planning Conference on Parks and Open Spaces, explained that— * * * "each area in the system would continue to serve the peculiar purpose that it has, or would have in the program of its particular administering agency, but every agency would be charged with the responsibility of preserving the wilderness character of any area of the national wilderness preservation system in its custody."

It is important to maintain our awareness of this concept as we move into practical considerations of specific situations, particular programs.

How, for example, could the sound multiple-use principles upheld by the U.S. Forest Service and by many of its cooperators be better expressed in a practical Federal policy and program? How can the necessity for transferring lands from one jurisdiction to another simply for the purposes of wilderness preservation be better avoided? How better could all who handle lands including wilderness be impressed with its values? In other words, how better can we see the difficult undertaking of wilderness preservation—in our culture, our expanding economy—incorporated in an accepted and thus effective national land-use policy and program?

EXHIBIT C

[From the June 1960 issue of National Wildlands News]

In a guest editorial for the June 1960 National Wildlands News, Howard Zahniser said that "application of the term 'multiple-use' to a concept developed through the years is one we all can share; but the use of the term as a shibboleth to obstruct wilderness preservation deserves criticism." He pointed out that for years "conservation leaders who have favored developing the concept that national forests are more than timber areas have advocated a bill such as the multiple-use bills now before Congress," yet he emphasized that these proposals cannot be substituted for wilderness-protective legislation. He warned that "conservationists must see that opponents of wilderness preservation are not permitted to abuse one good thing to frustrate another."

The full text of this National Wildlands News editorial, entitled "What About the Multiple-Use Bills?" is as follows:

"WHAT ABOUT THE MULTIPLE-USE BILLS?

"From the viewpoint of those concerned with the best administration of the national forests, a declaration of multiple-use policy in legislation is important. For years longer than they have been working on the wilderness bill, conservation leaders who have favored developing the concept that national forests are more than timber areas, have advocated a bill such as the multiple-use bills now before Congress.

"Such advocacy does not require agreement with those who make a contrast between multiple use and wilderness preservation in the national forests. The Forest Service itself has defined multiple use as that combination of uses of any area that best serves the public. Within national forest areas designated as wilderness, multiple use includes not only wilderness preservation, but also uses such as watershed protection, camping, and hiking. In some areas the only possible exclusion is timber cutting, which applies to a relatively small part of the national forest.

"Thus application of the term "multiple use" to a concept developed through the years is one we all can share; but the use of the term as a shibboleth to obstruct wilderness preservation deserves criticism. As long ago as the 17th century, John Locke exposed such abuses of words, and probably the practice was old then. The tactical use of multiple-use proposals to delay or defeat enactment of wilderness legislation is an abuse.

"Emphasis on a multiple-use bill appeals to those opposed to the wilderness bill who would be glad to see a measure enacted that they could argue would make wilderness legislation unnecessary (although of course, the need for the wilderness bill still would exist).

"Such emphasis is also placed by some who see this as a means for frustrating proposals to make national parks out of areas now within national forests. These people are seeking multiple-use legislation as means for meeting recreation and preservation needs in a program that will not interfere with commodity production and will take no land from the Forest Service.

"What should we do about it?

"First, we should concentrate on enactment of the wilderness bill, for otherwise we shall continue to be frustrated, year after year, by the delay of those who want no wilderness legislation. And while delay continues the wilderness bill will be subjected to successive mutilations and the areas themselves to whittling away.

"Such prospects should give us persistence. It is easier to take up new proposals than to work out the difficulties of one that is pending, but we should not yield to that temptation.

"History reminds us that the National Park Service Act of 1916 was first introduced in 1911. It is not likely that any basic measure could be adopted in our democratic system without delay, while all those concerned are being satisfied or reconciled. It should not be otherwise. Our democratic system is excellent. But we must work long and patiently—and considerately for others—in accomplishing such a purpose as the establishment of a national policy and program for wilderness preservation.

"The import of these observations is that the principal conservation objective in the remaining time of the 86th Congress is enactment of the wilderness bill, and conservationists should not cease to urge this upon their representatives in Washington. As to multiple use, they can recognize this as prominently set forth in the wilderness bill itself—a concept with which wilderness preservation is consistent. Legislation to assert multiple use also is desirable, but it should not be regarded as a substitute for the wilderness bill. Conservationists must see that the opponents of wilderness preservation are not permitted to abuse one good thing to frustrate another."

[From the Living Wilderness, June 1960]

CAN WE LOSE OUR OPPORTUNITY?

"We need the strength of a firmly stated national policy to preserve what little wilderness remains," said National Parks Magazine in a backcover editorial note in its June 1960 issue. "We need," continued the magazine, "adequate programs to make such a policy effective. Wherever administrators of public lands have wilderness in their custody—in parks, forests, and refuges—the American people should insist that these last resources of wilderness be carefully safeguarded and administered for the future as well as the present."

The magazine—official publication of the National Parks Association—also featured in this June 1960 issue a guest editorial by Howard Zahniser, warning that the opportunity to preserve a true living wilderness is "perishable." Entitled "Our Wilderness Opportunity—Can We Lose It?" the editorial described the issue as "not whether we shall have parks, or wildlife refuges, or outdoor-recreation areas in forests or parks" but "Will there live on in any of these areas what we know as wilderness?" The full text is as follows:

"OUR WILDERNESS OPPORTUNITY—CAN WE LOSE IT?

"Readers of this page are the custodians of one of the superlatively great opportunities of our history—the opportunity to establish an enduring policy and program for the preservation of wilderness. Yet we are in grave danger of losing this opportunity before it is even recognized or understood.

"We—the readers of this page—are the generation of preservationists who now comprise the National Parks Association, Nature Conservancy, Sierra Club, the Wilderness Society, and other organizations concerned with parks, wilderness, refuges, and all the various remaining places that are natural, unspoiled, wild, and unalienated. We are the mid-20th-century Americans who have in part inherited, in part created, this chance to fashion, in the midst of a highly organized, mechanized, urbanized culture, enduring policies and effective programs for preserving wilderness. We are the custodians of a perishable, diminishing, unique opportunity.

"The opportunity, it must be emphasized, is simply to preserve wilderness. If the opportunity is lost, the ultimate loss will be wilderness. The issue is not whether we shall have parks, or wildlife refuges, or outdoor-recreation areas in forests or parks. The question is: Will there live on in any of these areas what we know as wilderness? Or shall we, not recognizing the jeopardy of our peculiar opportunity, see ourselves and our successors satisfied with a continued partitioning of our areas of wilderness, an increasing use of them in ways that destroy their wilderness character and atmosphere?

"The wilderness—those extensive portions of our land where, in contrast with the areas in which man and his works dominate the landscape, the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a member of this community or a visitor who does not remain, whose travels leave only trails—this wilderness is still a part of our heritage. In a dozen dozen areas, or more, of our national parks and monuments, national forests, and wildlife refuges it not only still lives, but exists within federally owned lands where the Nation, if it will, can preserve and use it indefinitely as the living wilderness it now is. Without transfers of jurisdiction, without sacrificing purposes for which the areas already are administered, simply by recognizing that their wilderness character can be preserved while they also serve other purposes as park, forest, or refuge—thus can wilderness preservation be integrated within our existing policies.

"We have perceived rather clearly the conditions of such preservation. We have seen that all our land is destined for some human use. We have recognized that only those areas that are deliberately designated for preservation and protection in their natural condition can be expected to persist as wilderness.

"We have also realized that through such designations by the people, through Government, respected and enforced in this public interest, we can indeed provide the basis for an enduring preservation program. We have seen established a national park system on the basis of such designations, and, after prolonged controversies, the sanctity of dedications affirmed with such declarations as a national intention that no dam or reservoir constructed as a part of a great Federal project shall be within any national park or monument. Thus the way is prepared for dedication and preservation of wilderness.

"Yet we also have seen, and are seeing, difficulties in the way, many wayside distractions, and even temptations of our own. Policies and programs that may endure are opposed by those who wish to exploit commodities in wilderness or see wilderness preserved only tentatively, merely until they are ready to exploit or develop. Recreationists looking for areas to serve their good purpose see unspoiled areas of wilderness as invitations for parkways, cabin colonies, picnic grounds, and other conveniences that enhance landscape for many but destroy wilderness for everybody.

"Confronted with such opposition, we find patience and persistence less interesting than the newness of other good outdoor programs—reviewing scenic and recreation resources, for example, saving seashores, or visualizing the conversion of forests to parks. And as we hesitate, we ourselves, in the wilderness, are tempted to rationalize airplanes, justify administrative mechanized equipment, tolerate machinery that might save forage by replacing pack animals, or construe wilderness in a more convenient way. Thus our difficulties, our distractions, our temptations diminish and jeopardize our unique perishable opportunity.

"By not acting promptly and effectively, by modifying our effort for some more practical or more exciting reason, by unwillingness to devote all our resources as needed to the effort that is basic to all our future as wilderness preservers, we are running the risk of sacrificing the basis in reality for all our interest in wilderness. It is a sacrifice that would take from us the scientific values of wilderness and also the areas of reference which give meaning to the photographs, the motion pictures, paintings, and literature that inform and inspire us and can continue so to do as long as their basis in reality persists in the wilderness itself. The frontier value of the picnic grounds and campsites at the end of the road would perish too, and the wilderness meaning of the prospect from many miles of our best roadsides. We would gain a whole world of well-developed outdoor recreation and lose our sole purpose as wilderness preservers.

"Our opportunity is indeed perishable—our opportunity to preserve a true living wilderness. We are in danger of doing what we always have done, of continuing to use the wilderness as raw material out of which to fashion a culture that will seem, in our constantly more civilization-conditioned image, to be a better world, but one with less and less of its wilderness raw material.

"Toward national forests where multiple use may everywhere embrace the uses that sacrifice wilderness; toward national parks where even the back country will include the roads and accommodations that introduce more and more people to less and less wilderness—toward a beautiful, lovely outdoors where any of us would gladly live on century after century if we could, a marvelous land, but without wilderness—toward such a destiny we are surely headed if we hesitate and turn aside from the only way that we have yet found toward enduring policies and programs for wilderness preservation."

MULTIPLE USE

The President has now signed into law a bill that for the first time establishes as a legislative policy for the management of the national forests the principle of multiple use.

The multiple use principle as applied to the 181 million acres of forest and range lands and high mountain watersheds (organized into 151 national forests in 41 States and Puerto Rico) is unexceptionable in itself. It means that the forests shall be run for timber production on a sustained-yield basis, for watershed protection, for grazing on range land, for wildlife preservation and for outdoor recreation including wilderness protection. Each resource use is to have equal consideration. In some areas one will predominate, in other areas others, depending on the nature of the land. All of this is good policy, sound resource management, sensible conservation—if taken at face value.

It is not the language of the act itself but rather what may lie behind it that gives us pause. The Forest Service, along with many special-interest spokesmen with less lofty aims, has employed the term "multiple use" in an obvious effort to draw a contrast with the purely conservationist work of some organizations and agencies, such as the National Park Service. In fact, within the Government now there is a battle between these two services, arising from the Forest Service's fear that the Park Service may obtain for park purposes some lands now administered by the former.

There are such areas whose highest use would certainly be as national parks, where the kind of commercial exploitation that is permissible under Forest Service practice would be forever banned. The most notable potential park area is in the northern Cascades in the State of Washington. Others are in Oregon and Nevada. While the multiple-use law is acceptable in itself, it ought not be considered—as we fear some of its proponents consider it—as an alternative to, or a diversion from, the various proposals to create new national parks to provide permanent statutory protection for certain unique scenic areas. Nor should it be regarded as lessening in any way the need for the wilderness bill, which has been debated for years and which would establish firm legislative protection—that the multiple use bill does not establish—for the small remaining areas of primitive wilderness still held in Federal hands.

THE WILDERNESS BILL

Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton is a matter-of-fact Nebraskan and no alarmist, but some words he recently used had an alarming ring about them. As Mr. Seaton put it:

"There is every reason to believe that the next 5 or 10 years constitute critical years if we are to add what we need to our heritage of scenic, historic, and cultural treasures for the use and enjoyment of the greater, and largely urbanized, population of the future. * * * The important thing is that those places of high intrinsic value for public refreshment, enjoyment, and inspiration be quickly identified, and steps taken to protect and preserve them for this overriding purpose before they are irretrievably lost to other uses."

There literally is no time to lose. Fortunately some remedies, having already been thoroughly studied and discussed, lie immediately at hand. One of the most significant is the wilderness bill, which would establish for the first time as congressional policy the preservation of federally owned wild areas in their primeval state. The bill would add no new lands to the Federal domain, but would merely give clear statutory protection to perhaps 55 million acres of America's finest unspoiled country that is already included as wilderness within national parks, forests, wildlife refuges and other federally controlled areas.

The test of whether the administration and Congress are really serious about establishing a base for permanent protection of America's last untouched areas will come in the next few weeks. The Senate Interior Committee is expected to report the bill early this session. Favorable action can and should be taken by both Houses before adjournment on what may well come to be considered, along with the Antiquities Act of 1906, the Park Service Act of 1916, and a few other basic laws, part of the Magna Carta of American conservation.

SAVE OUR WILDERNESSES

It is not surprising to learn that there is opposition to a wilderness bill now being considered by the Senate Interior Committee.

The bill gives legal congressional recognition to the Nation's irreplaceable natural resources, land and waterways now free of private exploitation and still in virgin condition.

If the bill becomes law, no Government bureaucrat could spoil or abolish a wilderness area by Executive order. Before such an area could be obtained for commercial exploitation Congress would have to authorize it.

Among those who have been opposing the measure are lumber, mining, oil, electric power, and livestock interests.

There have been occasions in the past when a Secretary of the Interior, for example, has on his own authority released wilderness areas for private development.

Those of us in this section who were around before Great Smoky Mountains National Park was created vividly recall the powerful opposition to the park by big lumber and papermill corporations. If they had had their way, there would be no Smokies Park for this and all succeeding generations to enjoy. Instead, by this time, lumbering operations would have ruined a vast part of the land. There would be stumps instead of magnificent trees, flowering shrubs would have been killed out, and rippling streams would have disappeared.

The wilderness bill must be enacted.

[From the Philadelphia Sunday Bulletin, Jan. 17, 1960]

TIME FOR CLOSE LOOK AT WILDERNESS AREAS

So much is being written these days about the exploding population in this country that public attention is diverted from one of the things our teeming millions will need—space in which to play.

The wilderness areas in this country are now limited in number, and will become more so each year. It was only great fortune that induced Congress in 1872 to set aside the fabulous Yellowstone area as the first national park. Legislation is pending in Congress to preserve other of these wilderness areas.

Among the proposals are for shoreline parks at Cape Cod, the Oregon Dunes, Padre Island in Texas, Point Reyes in California, and the Indiana Dunes on Lake Michigan. A portion of the latter site is already a State park, but a new powerplant in the middle of what had been proposed as a national park seems to doom that project.

Another proposal is the preservation of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal along the Potomac River. Here opposition comes from rural electrification cooperatives. They want a power dam. One conflict is between the U.S. Forest Service and the National Park Service, the former resisting efforts to turn national forests into national parks.

Creation of a national wilderness system is needed to preserve the natural beauties and peculiarities of such areas as are still available. Every year some are swallowed up for industrial or other uses.

It is not necessary that park areas have such phenomena as mark western parks like Yellowstone, Glacier, and Yosemite. The Shenandoah Park here in the East lacks such spectacular features, and yet attracts a larger attendance than any other.

Finding and saving sites within fairly easy reach of large centers of population is no longer a simple matter. The longer Congress delays, the more difficult the job becomes.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 15, 1960]

THE FOREST PRIMEVAL

The Senate Interior Committee is finally due to act on the wilderness bill at its Tuesday meeting, and it seems high time for a decision on this meritorious measure. The session is already well along. Overwhelming endorsement may be necessary to propel the bill clear through the congressional labyrinth. As it stands, the legislation has the support of virtually every major conservation group, of the administration, and of a bipartisan bloc of 18 Senators. Once the bill is out of committee, there should be little dissent on its objective of giving a firm statutory basis to the preservation of some of our unspoiled forests.

Fortunately, all reasonable procedural objections now appear to be amicably resolved. After expressing grave doubts about the bill, Senator O'MAHONEY has announced his support in return for acceptance of clarifying amendments. These changes make it abundantly clear that the measure will have no adverse effect on existing private operations now permitted on the national forest lands. This should allay once and for all the fears of commercial interests that wilderness protection is somehow inimical to their operations. All who savor an outing in our remaining primeval woods will hope that the committee will at last get the measure itself out of the wilderness and onto the floor for a vote.

[From the Medford (Oreg.) Mail Tribune, Feb. 25, 1960]

SAVING THE WILDERNESS

Throughout the Nation, certain lands in Federal ownership are set aside as wilderness areas.

Some of them are in national parks. Some of them are wildlife refuges. And some of them are in national forests, dedicated under the Forest Service's concept of "the greatest good to the greatest number in the long run."

Some people argue that this is in violation of the Forest Service's dedication to "multiple use" of forest properties. But it isn't.

The "multiple use" concept does not mean that every acre of national forest shall be devoted to grazing, lumbering, recreation, and watershed protection, all at once. This isn't possible.

But it does mean that, in the overall picture, lands should be devoted to their best purposes—some for logging, some for recreation, some for grazing, and so on.

Thus, multiple use means many uses in one large area, through single-purpose use in smaller areas within the large area.

The wilderness area concept receives lip-service from some segments of the lumber industry.

But these same segments are the ones which are constantly trying to nibble away at the wilderness we now have; and which will try to nibble even harder as time passes, population rises, and the demand for forest products increases.

Even now this process under way—in the Olympic peninsula, closer to home in the Three Sisters Wilderness area, and elsewhere throughout the Nation.

Before the Congress at the moment there is a bill which would preserve our wilderness areas.

Now note: It does not call for the creation of new wilderness lands; it merely provides statutory protection for those in existence.

The idea is that the pressures which will arise to enter and despoil the wilderness can be more successfully resisted if they are designated by law, than if they are designated by agency regulation.

Once gone, the wilderness is gone forever. Let's hold on to it for the use of our children, and children's children.

AND WHY

Some may ask, "Why preserve the wilderness?"

If, in all honesty, they have to ask that question, they probably cannot be answered in any way which would satisfy them.

But those who have ventured into the unspoiled and uninhabited lands of our great West, who have watched the wildlife and seen the scenery, unmarred by roads or buildings or power lines or billboards—these know there are values here which cannot be measured in dollars and cents.

They know that the remaining acres of wilderness land, threatened at every hand by the pressures of civilization, constitue a national resource of magnificence and high worth.

The generation now living is the first in the history of this Nation to have any worry about preserving for future generations, wilderness areas.

Always before, they've just been there, waiting for those hardy enough to take advantage of them.

But now it has come to a point where it is correct to say, as one conservationist did not long ago:

"What we save in the next few years is all that will ever be saved."

One could expand upon the values of the wilderness.

About how they are the last remaining areas where natural ecology can be observed; about how they are as balm in Gilead to those seeking refreshment from the pressures of a mechanical civilization; and about how these values are going to become more, not less, important as population, mechanization, and "progress" continue their proliferation.

But if anyone needs convincing, he probably couldn't be convinced.

So it remains for those who believe these values are important to work to see them preserved against the encroachments which threaten them.

We'd like to wind up this little "sermon" with a couple of quotations. The first is from David Brower of the Sierra Club. Speaking of the wilderness, he said:

"Never have so few taken so much from so many—and so fast. The few is us. The many are the unnumbered yet to be born in all the time that may lie ahead for man, and who may remember us, if at all, as the generation which, in four short decades, outexploited all history and entered the fifth decade unsatiated."

The other is from Samuel Adams, speaking in 1771:

"If the liberties of America are ever completely ruined * * * it will in all probability be the consequence of a mistaken notion which leads men to acquiesce in measures of destructive tendency for the sake of present ease."

"Present ease" is fine and dandy. But what of the future?

[From the Los Angeles Mirror News, Mar. 1, 1960]

THE WILDERNESS BILL AND YOU

"The world," mourned the poet Wordsworth, "is too much with us; late and soon * * *."

What's worse, a geographic togetherness is making it impossible to fend off this encroaching world, even briefly. Urbanism grows. Wilderness vanishes.

Yet here in America some scattered fragments of true wilderness remain, which might be saved for ourselves and future generations.

SOME PLAIN TALK

Interior Secretary Seaton, a plaintalking midwesterner, says:

"The important thing is that those places of high intrinsic value for public refreshment, enjoyment and inspiration be quickly identified, and steps taken to protect and preserve them * * * before they are irretrievably lost to other uses."

Seaton gives the United States 10 years at most to complete a program of wilderness sanctuaries that would be safe from commercial exploitation.

Such a project must start immediately. Lengthy surveys by governmental and private agencies have pinpointed some 55 million acres scattered from Cape Cod to our own Pacific coastal forests.

All lie now within Federal domain. No new lands would have to be withdrawn.

There's a measure before the U.S. Senate (S. 1123) which would do the job.

Quite simply, this wilderness bill would forever retain these last unspoiled regions in their primeval state.

Every major U.S. conservation group has joined the Eisenhower administration in urging passage of such an act. Who's against it? Mainly those with a special, selfish interest in exploiting these hitherto untouched areas.

Our own highly respected Sierra Club, founded in 1892 by John Muir, stands in the forefront of this fight. They've just issued a breathtakingly beautiful book called "This Is the American Earth." Its photographs by famed Ansel Adams and its poetic text by Nancy Newhall present the wilderness case better than a dozen senatorial orations.

"A tragic loss," says Sierra Club director David Brower, "could be prevented if only there could be broader understanding of this: that the resources of the earth do not exist just to be spent for the comfort, pleasure, or convenience of the generation or two who first learn how to spend them; that some of the resources exist for saving, and what diminishes them diminishes all mankind; that one of them is wilderness."

LAST DITCH BATTLE

We firmly believe this last ditch battle to preserve a semblance of our wilderness heritage should be joined by thinking people throughout the country. We urge it wholeheartedly.

For as Miss Newhall concludes in her commentary in the Sierra volume:

"Were all learning lost, all music stilled,
Man, if these resources still remained to him,
Could again hear singing in himself
And rebuild anew the habitations of his thought."

[From the Washington Star, Mar. 5, 1960]

NATURE'S LAST STAND

The so-called wilderness bill, under study by the Senate Interior Committee, would raise a permanent barrier against future exploitation of the Nation's remaining outdoor sanctuaries for wildlife and escapist humans—our national parks and forests. It would be in the public interest, therefore, for the present Congress to erect this barrier at the earliest opportunity.

The fact that the Federal Government holds title to some 55 million acres of unspoiled scenery, most of it in the West, has provided no guarantee against commercial or other encroachment—through piecemeal legislation. There has been no policy to guide Congress in the handling of the recurrent proposals to open Federal reservations to various kinds of private enterprise, from cattle-grazing operations to timber cutting. The wilderness bill, supported by administration officials and most of the country's conservation and wildlife organizations, would fix as a national policy the protection of federally owned open spaces from inroads by such special interests.

Here is a bill requiring neither the creation of any new bureau nor the appropriation of additional money for parks and forests. Its adoption, however, would stand as a permanent restraint on Congress against any measures that might run counter to the established national conservation policy. We hope the Senate committee will report the bill favorably and that Congress will write the policy into law.

[From the Oklahoma City Times, Apr. 19, 1960]

IMPORTANCE OF WILDERNESS

There is justifiable solicitude about the building up of urban industrial patterns in Oklahoma, which is a comparatively young State, only three score and 10 years removed from the wilderness. However, it is beginning to dawn on many farsighted conservationists that human conservation is the most worthy objective of all, and that it is best served by renewing our devotion to natural things.

A onetime Oklahoman, Dr. Paul B. Sears, now director of the Yale University Conservation Department, sensed this situation long ago and issued many warnings concerning the painful fact that "man is the only creature that destroys his own environment." He now speaks with special authority to a State that is becoming devoted to science, for he is a recent past president of the American Society for the Advancement of Science.

There is increasing evidence from scientific sources that Mother Nature is the one woman who always has the last word. Medical experts are combing the wilderness for plants, organisms and substances that safeguard human health, for it is increasingly realized that Mother Nature has an extraordinary laboratory of her own, doing business for millions of years.

This time of year Oklahomans, like most other Americans turn their eyes toward the areas where natural forces have their most effective scope—the mountains, forests, lakes, oceans, the open fields where natural processes are least molested by human mischiefmakers.

At this time it is particularly appropriate, therefore, that Oklahomans, like all other Americans, be concerned with the progress of what has come to be known as the wilderness bill.

Only 2 percent of our total land resources come under this bill. It does not conflict with any existing rights of individuals, States or Federal Government. It will not conflict with grazing rights. Best of all, it does not call for any expenditure of the taxpayers' money.

Oklahoma has a small area devoted to wilderness treatment. It ought to have more. At any rate all Oklahomans travel during the vacation season, and like to head for the national parks and other reserved areas devoted to outdoor life under natural conditions. The wilderness bill needs your support. Our legislators in Washington might well be reminded of the desirability of this measure.

[From the Lemoore (Calif.) Advance, Apr. 23, 1960]

ACT NOW TO SAFEGUARD WILDERNESS AREAS

Residents of the Lemoore area are most fortunate to live within 2 hours easy driving time from some of the outstanding seashore and mountain recreation areas to be found in America.

And, many local residents appreciate their good fortune and make frequent use throughout the year of these great treasures.

Increasingly, that will be the case as California's rising tide of population spills over into the Central Valley in the years ahead.

There is sound reasoning, therefore, and an element of urgency for the residents of this region to assure protection of those areas from the unending thrusts of commercial interests whose utilization of them forever would remove them from public use.

Pending before a committee in the U.S. Senate is the wilderness bill, which has been described as "the most important conservation measure now before Congress." It has been endorsed by 22 National and 58 State and other organizations and many prominent individuals throughout the country.

WHY THE BILL IS NEEDED

1. Wilderness (comprising but 2 percent of the Nation's land area) now has only administrative protection. There is no national wilderness policy or program prescribed by Congress. Administrators change; their ideas on the composition and values of wilderness differ. One administrator can abolish or seriously reduce wilderness established by another. Administrators are under pressures difficult to withstand when there are no congressional guidelines.

2. The wilderness bill would provide the guidance and strengthen the hands of administrators, since it requires administering agencies to preserve the wilderness areas in their charge.

3. Congress, representing all the people, should have the decisive voice in stating and carrying out a policy regarding the use of public lands for the benefit of all the people of the Nation.

WHAT THE BILL WILL DO

1. Establish a national policy for wilderness preservation and a program to make it effective.

2. Give statutory protection to wilderness areas in national parks and monuments, national forests, and national wildlife refuges and ranges.

3. Establish a National Wilderness Preservation System "for the permanent good of the whole people" to consist of the now-existing wilderness areas in the forests, parks, and refuges.

4. Set up an orderly procedure for additions, deletions, or changes in the Wilderness Preservation System, with provisions for due notice, public hearings, and review by Congress.

WHAT THE BILL WILL NOT DO

1. It will not conflict with established uses of the parks, monuments, forests, or wildlife refuges.

2. It will not interfere with established practices, such as grazing, for example. It includes no areas now open to lumbering.

3. It will not endanger existing private rights; it specifically safeguards them.

4. It will not call for money; it merely sets up a system by which existing Federal agencies will preserve wilderness values in the specified areas already under their jurisdiction.

WHERE IS THE BILL NOW?

After two hearings in Washington, D.C., and six held in the West, the bill is in the Senate Interior Committee. It has undergone three revisions and is acceptable to its advocates, who urge that it be reported promptly by the Interior Committee and enacted by the Senate.

In the House Interior Committee, leadership has agreed to take up the bill as soon as it is passed by the Senate. The current, revised version of the bill has been sent to the House for study.

In view of the national political conventions to be held this summer, Congress is working for adjournment in July. It is anticipated a logjam of legislation will occur in the final weeks of the session. It is vital that action on the wilderness bill be taken promptly if it is to be enacted this year in desirable form.

In defense of priceless recreational areas to be enjoyed by themselves and by future generations, citizens should direct post cards or letters to Congressman HARLAN HAGEN, House Office Building, Washington, D.C., or to Senator THOMAS H. KUCHEL, Senate Office Building, Washington, or to the chairman of the Interior Committee, Senate Office Building, urging them to speed up action on the wilderness bill as revised in Committee Print 3 and asking them to oppose last-minute substitute proposals that would delay or frustrate the intent of this much needed legislation.

Please do this now. Do not delay.

[From the Nashville Tennessean, Apr. 30, 1960]

DAR IS WRONG

The wilderness bill now being considered by Congress, has been rightly termed an investment for the ages.

It establishes a national policy for wilderness preservation and a program to make it efficient. It gives statutory protection to wilderness areas in national parks and monuments, national forests, and national wildlife refuges and ranges.

It will not endanger existing private rights; it specifically safeguards them, and it will not call for money.

That such an appealing measure should have wide support with little regard to partisanship is not unnatural, and this is one reason why the recent vote of opposition to it by the Daughters of the American Revolution is hard to understand. Such bodies as the Garden Clubs of America, General Federation of Women's Clubs, and many other diversified organizations have given wholehearted endorsement.

These were not moved by the claim that sheepherders, cattlemen, hard-rock miners, lumber and oil men were ranged against the measure.

Well, regardless of the DAR's who think so lightly of a measure to insure sound management of the Nation's parklands and monuments, and regardless of the free enterprise slogan which is being used in opposition, this is a bill that deserves passage without further alterations to favor private interests.

[From the Waynesboro (Pa.) Record Herald, May 6, 1960]

THE WILDERNESS BILL

A wilderness area is by definition a natural place unspoiled—or unimproved, if you like—by the hand of man. There are only a few such areas left in the United States. Unless they are preserved by explicit statute, there is danger that little or no wilderness area will remain a few decades hence.

Yet the privilege of entering such an area, of experiencing the special beauties of wild country not sullied by human exploitation, is part of the American heritage. It is within the power of this generation to preserve this heritage for those yet unborn. The instrument for doing that is the so-called wilderness bill which has languished for so long in the Senate.

The measure has been bottled up because there is powerful opposition to it. This opposition spring basically from the fact that passage of the bill would make it harder for private interests to exploit wilderness areas.

There appear to be overwhelming reasons for support of this measure in the public interest, however. It would establish congressional policy undergirding the wilderness concept; it would make it impossible for any Federal official, including Cabinet officers, to remove a wilderness area from that category.

Congress has many other things on its mind these days, not excluding the coming political conventions and their aftermath. But there is no sound reason for additional delay on the wilderness bill. It has been gone over with a fine-tooth comb. It should be brought to a vote before this session adjourns.

EXHIBIT E

[From the Washington Evening Star, June 29, 1960]

WHY THE DELAY?

It is hard to understand why the so-called wilderness bill continues to languish in committee at the Capitol. The Senate Interior Committee completed hearings on the measure long ago, but it still has the bill "under study in executive committee." No hearings have been held on the House side at all. Yet this bill involves no appropriations, no hiring of additional personnel or other apparently objectionable aspects. Its purpose is of the highest order—to establish for the first time as a national policy the preservation of what remains of America's great national parks and forests.

Congress from time to time, since the creation of Yellowstone National Park in 1872, has evidenced its desire to save important remnants of the Nation's primeval areas from destruction by commercial interests. However, there has been no overall policy statute to guide these piecemeal conservation moves. The wilderness bill, favored by administration officials, conservation organizations and many other groups, would furnish such a guide. The proposed legislation would not foreclose Congress from opening certain lands to exploitation in the future, if this were regarded as in the public interest, but it would put a much-needed restraint on hasty legislation, pressured by lumber, cattle, mining or other interests.

Our natural resources are feeling these pressures in ever-increasing degrees. We will be neglecting our responsibilities if we fail to make every reasonable effort today to save them.

NATIONAL SECURITY RESERVE OF FOOD, FIBER, AND BIOLOGICAL OIL COMMODITIES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish a national security reserve of food, fiber, and biological oil commodities, and products thereof, for the purpose of protecting the United States against shortages of such commodities and products during national emergencies.

Mr. President, this is not a new suggestion. Recently the senior Senator from Minnesota reviewed the legislative history of the national security reserve before this body. On February 8, 1955, I introduced a resolution asking for the establishment of a national food and fiber policy that included the establishment of adequate safety reserves of farm commodities and food and fiber products.

On February 27, 1956, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] joined with me in introducing an amendment to the agricultural bill that was under discussion at the time that had as its purpose the establishment of a safety reserve. The amendment was accepted by the Senate as part of the Agricultural Act of 1956 which did not, as is well remembered, become law. Later farm legislation that was enacted required the Secretary of Agriculture to study the problems and procedures involved in setting up such a reserve and make recommendations to the Congress. The Secretary recommended that no such reserve be established.

The Humphrey Family Farm Program Development Act, introduced on August 6, 1959, contains a section that requires the submission to Congress of a plan for establishing a national security reserve. This bill is before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

In consideration of the history of this proposal and the continuing need to strengthen our national security, the senior Senator from Minnesota now proposes that the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization be authorized and directed to establish a reserve stockpile of food, fiber, and biological oil commodities, and products thereof, in quantities adequate to protect the Nation against the hazards of natural disasters, insect pests, diseases, and other national emergencies.

The details of the establishment and use of the National Security Reserve are spelled out in the bill I have sent to the desk.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3812) to establish a national security reserve of food, fiber, and biological oil commodities, and products thereof, for the purpose of protecting the United States against shortages of such commodities and products during national emergencies, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization (hereafter referred to as "Director") is authorized and directed to establish a reserve and stockpile of food, fiber, and biological oil commodities, and products thereof, in quantities adequate to protect the Nation against the hazards of natural disasters, insect pests, diseases, and other national emergencies. Such reserve, which shall be stored in dispersed areas throughout the United States, shall be known as the National Security Reserve.

SEC. 2. The Director shall, in conjunction with the Secretary of Agriculture and the National Security Council, make a determination as soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act with respect to the kinds and quantities of agricultural commodities and products thereof that are needed to establish the National Security Reserve; and shall annually thereafter determine the kinds and quantities of agricultural commodities and products thereof that should be added to the National Security Reserve in order to maintain it at a level adequate to insure the United States against shortages during national emergencies.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to transfer to the Director such quantities of agricultural commodities owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation, and not required for domestic consumption, export, or other food and fiber distribution programs administered by the Department of Agriculture, as may be needed for establishing and maintaining the National Security Reserve. The Director shall reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for any commodities so transferred.

SEC. 4. The Director shall purchase in the open market such volume of agricultural commodities and products thereof as may be needed to augment those commodities acquired by transfer from the Commodity Credit Corporation pursuant to section 2 in order to meet and maintain the requirements established for the National Security Reserve.

SEC. 5. (a) The National Security Reserve shall not be reduced except (1) on order of the President at any time when in his judgment such reduction is required for purposes of the common defense, (2) in time of war or during a national emergency with respect to common defense proclaimed by the President, on order of such agency as may be designated by the President, (3) on order of the President, by transfer to the national stockpile established pursuant to the Act of June 7, 1939, as amended (50 U.S.C. 98–98h).

(b) If the quantity of any commodity or product in the National Security Reserve is reduced by natural or other cause beyond the control of the Director, there shall be restored to the National Security Reserve at the earliest practicable date an amount of such commodity or product equal to the amount of such reduction.

SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such funds as may be required to carry out the provisions of this Act.

FACTORY INSPECTION AND DRUG AMENDMENTS OF 1960

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, at the request of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, I introduce a bill to protect the public health by amending the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act so as to clarify and strengthen existing inspection authority thereunder; require manufacturers of new drugs to keep records of, and make reports on, clinical experience and other relevant data bearing on the permissibility of such drugs; require that drugs be prepared or packed under adequate controls to insure proper identity, strength, purity, and quality, and otherwise insure their compliance with the Act; and extend to all antibiotics the certification provisions of the act now limited to certain antibiotics.

The principal purpose of the bill is to strengthen the enforcement powers of the Food and Drug Administration in order to provide better assurance that drugs and other products coming under its jurisdiction are not of injurious or inferior quality.

A bill to accomplish similar objectives for prescription drugs was introduced on June 15, 1960, by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Both bills are the outgrowth of the extensive hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Committee on the Judiciary under the chairmanship of Senator KEFAUVER. Undoubtedly, no legislation would have been presented to this Congress had these hearings not been held. I wish to commend Senator KEFAUVER for conducting these hearings.

While both bills are similar in their general objectives, there are some important differences in the provisions of the two bills. These are details which the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will examine in the course of hearings and of the consideration of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3815) to protect the public health by amending the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act so as to clarify and strengthen existing inspection authority thereunder; require manufacturers of new drugs to keep records of, and make reports on, clinical experience and other relevant data bearing on the permissibility of such drugs; require that drugs be prepared or packed under adequate controls to insure proper identity, strength, purity, and quality, and otherwise insure their compliance with the act; and extend to all antibiotics the certification provisions of the act now limited to certain antibiotics, introduced by Mr. HILL, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

EXPRESSION OF SENSE OF CONGRESS IN FAVOR OF GRANTING RELIEF TO DOMESTIC CARPET INDUSTRY

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I submit, for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution, and ask unanimous consent that it lie on the table for additional cosponsors until 3 days after Congress reconvenes after the recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the concurrent resolution will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

The concurrent resolution—Senate Concurrent Resolution 113—was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that appropriate action be taken under article XXVIII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade with a view to modifying or withdrawing concessions made by the United States on the following articles: Wilton carpets, rugs, and mats; Brussels carpets, rugs, and mats; velvet or tapestry carpets, rugs, and mats; and carpets, rugs, and mats of like character or description; all the foregoing classifiable under paragraph 1117(a) of the Tariff Act of 1930.

SEC. 2. It is further the sense of the Congress that the following relief should be provided for the American carpet industry;

(a) The present rate of duty should apply to imports during any calendar year up to an amount equal to 5 per centum of domestic shipments for the twelve-month period ending June 30 of the preceding year;

(b) On imports in excess of such percentage all concessions should be withdrawn or a flat duty of 40 per centum ad valorem should be imposed;

(c) Each year the "low duty quota" should be allocated among all exporting countries on the basis of average imports to the United States in the years 1956 to 1959, inclusive, with imports from any country above such amount to be dutiable at the higher rate.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the carpet industry of the United States is being severely damaged by imports of Wilton and velvet carpets. These imports come primarily from Belgium and Japan. The alarming increase of these imports demands that some immediate action be taken by the U.S. Goverment to prevent the ruin of our domestic carpet industry.

From 1948 to 1950 the duty on Wilton and velvet imports was 30 percent ad valorem, and during this period imports were generally on the rise but averaged only about 5 percent of domestic consumption. From the beginning of 1951 through the middle of 1956, the duty on such imports was 25 percent, and during this period imports increased to approximately 12 percent of domestic consumption. In 1956, again in 1957, and again in 1958, the duty on such imports was reduced, and it stands today at 21 percent ad valorem. With each decrease in duty, imports have increased substantially. They rose 52 percent in 1959, and in the first quarter of 1960, they increased 60 percent. Imports of Wilton and velvet carpets are now approximately 23 percent of domestic consumption.

Mr. President, the mushrooming of imports of Wilton and velvet carpet does not reflect a recapture by foreign producers of the domestic American market which was lost during the war. On the contrary, there were very few imports of such carpets prior to the war, and very little foreign capacity for the production of them. In 1939 the United States imported 200,000 square yards. In 1959 these imports stood at 7,012,000 square yards. Based on the first quarter rate, 1960 imports will reach 10 million square yards.

Mr. President, the American Carpet Institute has attempted to utilize the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Act to protect themselves from the impact of this tremendous surge of imports. In 1958 proceedings were instituted before the Tariff Commission under the escape clause. In its decision, handed down in January 1959, the Tariff Commission, in a 3-to-2 decision, denied relief, and a majority of the Commission indicated that there was no imminent danger to the domestic industry from imports. Now, slightly over a year later, these imports have almost doubled, rising from 12 percent of domestic consumption to 23 percent.

Mr. President, there is another procedure whereby the American carpet industry can obtain relief under existing law. Article XXVIII of the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs provides that—

> On the first day of each 3-year period, the first period beginning on January 1958, a contracting party may modify or withdraw concessions included in the appropriate schedule annexed to this agreement.

The American Carpet Institute has applied to the U.S. Government to modify or withdraw its concessions with regard to Wilton and velvet imports, and in the future to apply the present rate of duty to imports during any calendar year up to an amount equal to 5 percent of domestic consumption for the 12-month period ending June 30 of the preceeding year; and on imports in excess of 5 percent of domestic consumption, all concessions should be withdrawn or a flat duty of 40 percent ad valorem should be imposed. The low duty quota should be allocated among exporting countries on the basis of their history of exports to this country.

Mr. President, refusal by the administration to grant this relief to the domestic carpet industry would be completely unconscionable. In the relatively short period of 10 years, imports of Wilton and velvet carpets have increased from less than one-twentieth of domestic consumption to almost one-fourth of the domestic consumption. If the present trend is allowed to continue, the domestic industry will be completely destroyed. Article XXVIII of the General agreement on Tariffs and Trade is a complete recognition by the contracting nations that such a situation should not be allowed to occur. In view of the calloused and irresponsible administration of the trade policy of the United States, as evidenced by the repeated refusals of the administration to grant relief under appropriate procedures established by the Congress, it is imperative that the Congress now express itself emphatically to the administration that the destruction of domestic industries must not, and will not, be permitted.

The concurrent resolution which I have sent to the desk expresses the sense of Congress that the relief under article XXVIII of General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which has been requested by the American Carpet Institute, should be granted. I urge the committee to give it immediate attention in order that it may be enacted prior to the final adjournment of Congress in August.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TRADE ADJUSTMENT PROBLEMS

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, outcries against competition from imports are becoming ever louder as imports mount faster than exports. The Special Senate Committee on Unemployment Problems, of which it was my privilege to be a member, recently completed 27 days of hearings in 24 cities throughout the United States. Everywhere we heard complaints that competition from abroad is injuring American industry and American labor.

Complaints are heard from the coal fields of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Illinois, from the pottery industry of Ohio, from producers of lumber and plywood in the Pacific Northwest, producers of textiles in New England and the Carolinas, and many others. There is growing concern even in industries which hitherto have been on an export basis, such as automobiles, electronics, and photographic equipment. Last summer, at hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, similar complaints were heard from producers of machine tools and tractors in Wisconsin. So extensive has foreign competition apparently become that it is sometimes referred to as the new import competition.

The Special Subcommittee on Unemployment was so impressed by the testimony it heard that it recommended that adjustment legislation be enacted to relieve the impact of intensified foreign competition on the employees, businesses, and communities adversely affected.

Most of the factual information that we have, however, is spotty and impressionistic. We know little, specifically, regarding the degree to which imports actually are displacing domestic capital and labor. Most of the testimony that has been presented to congressional committees and to the U.S. Tariff Commission is faulty in this respect. It is not unnatural, and certainly it is in keeping with the tariff history of the United States, for those who favor a more liberal trade policy to belittle the harmful effects of import competition and for those who have a protectionist philosophy to magnify them. The protectionist-free trade debate is as typically American as Mark Twain and the hotdog. It would be unrealistic to expect the debate suddenly to become completely objective and factual.

The overall statistics, however, are reasonably clear. U.S. merchandise exports have not been increasing rapidly enough to counterbalance the large payments that the United States has been making since the close of World War II to support its Military Establishment abroad and for foreign grant aid. In recent years these unilateral payments have been averaging between $4 billion and $5 billion a year. Furthermore, there has been a marked increase in U.S. private foreign investment, particularly since 1955.

Because of sustained economic development in Western Europe and Japan, there have been greatly increased imports of competitive products from those areas. In Western Europe the situation has been intensified by the formation of the European Common Market and the European Free Trade Association.

American manufacturers are awakening to the fact that they no longer enjoy the international sellers' market that has been theirs since the close of World War II. International selling has become competitive and the sellers' market is being supplanted by a buyers' market.

In consequence, the United States has been accumulating a steadily mounting deficit in its balance of international dollar payments, which reached the high levels of $3.4 billion in 1958 and $3.7 billion in 1959—deficits which have been accompanied by a loss of about $3 billion of gold since 1957.

As long as U.S. foreign policy calls for the unilateral oversea spending of $4 billion to $5 billion a year for the support of its Military Establishment abroad and for foreign aid, it is imperative that exports expand relative to imports, or, more accurately stated, for international dollar receipts to expand relative to dollar payments.

Increased merchandise imports and the flight of substantial quantities of American capital abroad have combined to squeeze certain producers in the United States. The pressure appears to be particularly oppressive in certain areas of the country where there is already some unemployment.

Bills were introduced into Congress several years ago to provide adjustment assistance to capital, labor, and communities adversely affected by imports. Proposals also have been made for equalizing unit labor costs here and abroad and for imposing a system of import quotas.

Some of these proposals would have the effect of throttling international trade, which would be particularly harmful to the free world and would undermine confidence in our ability to point the way to successful democracy.

Are we in a dilemma or is the problem soluble? Certainly we all agree that the maintenance of a strong U.S. economy is essential, not only to our own welfare in the short run, but to the entire free world, including ourselves, in the long run. If we can think of no better way of assuring a strong domestic economy than by throttling international trade we shall imperil our own longrun welfare. Foreign trade is the very lifeblood of those countries of the free world whose resources and production are not as varied or abundant as ours. It is imperative that we find a solution that will expand trade, but which, at the same time, will not aggravate unemployment in the United States. I have found no disagreement with this general objective. The difficulties arise when we try to implement it in terms of practical policy and programs.

The Special Committee on Unemployment Problems recommended that some sort of adjustment legislation be enacted to relieve the impact of international trade policies on employees, businesses and communities adversely affected by imports resulting from foreign trade policies. Such legislation would provide for Federal assistance to individuals, firms and communities injured by imports resulting from expansive trade policies that are necessary in the national interest. Proposals incorporated in bills that already have been introduced into Congress include: extension of the time for drawing federally financed unemployment compensation, lowering the eligibility age for old-age assistance of those affected adversely by import competition, and the establishment of financial, technical and training programs for younger workers. Those who favor such legislation emphasize that dislocations caused by foreign trade policy, unlike dislocations caused by technological changes and changes in consumer preference are the result of governmental action, a fact which provides a basis for supporting Government measures designed to alleviate the problem.

DIMENSIONS OF THE PROBLEM

Before we can hope to agree on a solution we need to know the dimensions of the problem. How many jobs are at stake? Which industries are vulnerable, and which sections of the country give promise of being injured?

At the present time answers are not available to the following specific questions:

First. How many persons in the United States owe their present employment to imports or exports?

Second. What is the relationship between changes in foreign trade and job opportunities?

Third. How many workers are faced with employment adjustment resulting from the transfer of demand from domestic to foreign sources of supply?

Fourth. What has been the experience of people who have lost jobs because of competitive imports? Have they remained in the same industries? In the same localities? Have they had to leave their community to seek employment elsewhere?

Fifth. What can government, labor, and industry do for persons and industries suffering dislocation from foreign trade? How much of this country's gross national product is shipped overseas?

Sixth. What proportion of U.S. consumption is produced overseas?

Seventh. What proportion of U.S. imports is produced by oversea branches of industries wholly or partly owned by U.S. industries?

About 7 years ago estimates were made of the number of jobs that would be adversely affected if the United States were to suspend all of its tariffs. The estimates were made under the auspices of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report on the basis of economic conditions that prevailed in 1951. At the request of the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy—the Randall Commission—the Bureau of Labor Statistics equated these estimates to their job equivalents and found that the temporary suspension of all tariffs by the United States would result in increased imports having a short-run displacement effect on not more than 200,000 workers. These were only estimates, however, based on informed guesses by foreign trade experts.

Were these 7-year-old estimates tenable? If not, which areas of the economy are more vulnerable than they were then? Information presently available in Government is not adequate to provide answers to these questions. We need vastly more facts if we are to legislate intelligently on this vital problem.

I am, therefore, submitting, for appropriate reference a bill to establish a special Senate committee composed of 11 Members of the Senate to devote the next 12 months to this problem and report its findings and recommendations to the Senate by not later than June 30, 1961. This will give the Senate sufficient time to permit all interested parties to express their views so that the Senate itself can have an up-to-date report on which to base whatever legislation then seems appropriate.

It is timely that this be done now since the Trade Agreements Act is due to come up for consideration in June of 1962. Unless the Senate is adequately informed as to the facts it may find itself being pressured into taking action that may be inimical to the welfare of the country.

We can ill afford to lock ourselves up in a shell of economic self-containment. The struggle of the free world against the forces of totalitarianism is now primarily in the economic sphere. What we do with respect to international economic policy will not only affect our own level of living, but will demonstrate to the uncommitted areas of the world the relative merits of our system and that of communism.

I am happy to say, that the United States has done a good job in at least one area in demonstrating its ability to lead. We must not falter. The United States, Canada, and 18 European countries are forming what is to be known as the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a vehicle by which the free world will direct its economic efforts toward economic development.

It is incumbent on the United States that it pursue policies that will have the effect of increasing trade in the non-Communist world. At the same time it must not diminish its efforts to point the way to the development of economically underdeveloped regions. While doing this it must see to it that its own domestic economy is vigorous and not marred by unemployment. Without a strong U.S. economy the economies of other free countries will be endangered. Intelligent action with respect to foreign-trade policy and employment is an important key to the survival of our way of life on this planet.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred in the first instance to the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration and that referral to the substantive committee involved be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

There being no objection, the resolution—Senate Resolution 350—was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Whereas a sound international trade policy aimed at expanding world trade is essential to the welfare, economic well-being, and national security of the United States; and

Whereas such policy may affect to varying degrees, among other domestic matters, employment and unemployment, utilization of productive facilities and industrial competition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That there is hereby established a special committee to be composed of nine members to be appointed by the President of the Senate, to be known as the Committee on Trade Adjustment Problems. Six members of the committee shall be appointed from the majority party and three members from the minority party.

SEC. 2. The committee shall conduct a full and complete study and inquiry concerning (1) the extent to which unemployment or shifts in employment are caused by an increase in imports resulting from tariff reductions; (2) the likely extent of future unemployment or shifts in employment arising from increased imports resulting from tariff reductions; (3) the history and content of plans and programs designed to assist workers and industries in adjusting to new competition arising from trade liberalization; (4) a feasible and practical plan or program of adjustment assistance for the United States. The committee shall report its findings and recommendations to the Senate no later than June 30, 1961. No proposed legislation shall be referred to such committee and such committee shall not have power to report by bill, or otherwise have legislative jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. The said committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such places and times during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable.

SEC. 4. A majority of the members of the committee or any subcommittee thereof shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except that a lesser number, to be fixed by the committee, shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking sworn testimony.

SEC. 5. The committee shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary in the performance of its duty. The committee is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the various departments and agencies of the Government to the extent that such services, information, facilities, and personnel, in the opinion of the heads of such departments and agencies, can be furnished without undue interference with the performance of the work and duties of such departments and agencies. The committee is authorized to procure, by contract or otherwise, the services of public or private organizations or institutions.

SEC. 6. The expenses of the committee, in an amount not to exceed $200,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to stabilize the mining of lead and zinc by domestic producers on public, Indian and other lands, and for other purposes."

The explanation of the amendments presented by Mr. ALLOTT is as follows:

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO H.R. 8860

The proposed amendments to H.R. 8860 would:

(1) Make the program applicable to all producers rather than limit it to "small" producers. This amendment is suggested for two reasons:

(a) to the extent that the additional program is successful in stimulating additional production, market prices will tend to be depressed. The payment contemplated under the proposed amendment would compensate the larger producers for this price depressant effect.

(b) there is a great deal of difficulty in defining a small mine. Definitions of small lead-zinc mines suggested in the present session alone have ranged all the way from 500 tons to 5,000 tons.

(2) Reduce the payment targets from 14.5 cents for zinc and 17 cents for lead to 13.5 cents for zinc and 15.5 for lead. These are prices which the domestic industry can reasonably look forward to over the next few years. The prices called for in the House-passed version are unrealistic and would encourage entry into production of mines that are by their very nature marginal and would be perpetually in need of Government financial assistance to maintain operations. It seems reasonable to provide stable returns to mines based upon what may well be the general level of market prices in the coming years, but there is little logic in establishing the high prices called for in the House-passed bill in the certainty that upon termination of the program, or in the event that appropriations should fail of approval at some point, the beneficiaries would be forced to suspend operations.

(3) The payment levels have been reduced to 2,000 tons of combined lead and/or zinc from the present tonnage relationship of 2,000 tons of lead plus 2,000 tons of zinc. This will provide much more equitable treatment for participants and tend to give all participants relatively equal benefits from the program in relationship to their overall size rather than giving reduced benefits to producers who, for one reason or another, have output of only one of the two metals.

(4) Borrowing authority, rather than reliance on annual appropriations, is proposed in order to provide participants the maximum assurance of stable operations over the period covered by the program.

Mr. DOUGLAS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 9662) to make technical revisions in the income tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to estates, trusts, partners, and partnerships, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, Senate bill 2973, to provide increases in compensation of food-service workers and laundry workers under the Veterans' Administra-

Therefore, I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SPEECH AND HEARING PROBLEMS OF ALASKA—LETTER

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, one of the accomplishments of the Senate which is of national importance and of great significance in Alaska was approval of Senate Joint Resolution 127, relating to the training of teachers of the deaf and for the training of speech pathologists and audiologists. A letter from Dr. David L. Sparling, pediatrician for the Alaska Native Health Service at Mount Edgecumbe, pediatric consultant for the Alaska Department of Health, and school physician at the two boarding schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, expressed the urgent nature of hearing problems among young Alaskans. This letter, one of those letters from my State which played a major part in persuading me of the desirability of Senate Joint Resolution 127, will be of interest to many people throughout the Nation because of the startling picture it gives of hearing problems in Alaska. I ask unanimous consent that the letter to me of March 17, 1960, from Dr. David L. Sparling be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 17, 1960.

Hon. E. L. BARTLETT,
Senator from Alaska, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BARTLETT: I am writing with reference to Senate Joint Resolution 127, introduced by Senator LISTER HILL, an act for the training of teachers of the deaf and for the training of speech pathologists and audiologists. I believe that the substance of this resolution is particularly important to residents of Alaska.

You are aware that social and economic problems and the difficulty of providing emergency medical care at all times in our more remote villages have been particularly harmful to the health of children in Alaska. Resulting handicaps have been especially prevalent in preschool children and particularly native youngsters from the more isolated villages. And among the most frequent resulting disease situations is chronic infection of the middle ear with mastoiditis. If untreated the sequel of this chronic ear infection is deafness in a majority of cases.

As pediatrician for the Alaska Native Health Service at Mount Edgecumbe, pediatric consultant for the Alaska Department of Health, and school physician at the two boarding schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, I have had unusual opportunities to observe the prevalence of chronic ear infections and consequent deafness among children. Chronic ear infections are found in as many as 30 percent of children admitted to Mount Edgecumbe Hospital from outside the local community for reasons other than ear infection. Chronic ear infections are found in 10 percent of the students enrolled at Wrangell Institute Elementary Boarding School who come from the more remote villages of Alaska and in more than 5 percent of the students enrolled at Mount Edgecumbe Secondary Boarding School. Chronic ear infections have been found in as many as 30 percent of randomly selected children evaluated in certain native villages and are prevalent in a large number of the villages particularly in the Bethel area, but widely scattered throughout Alaska.

Educationally handicapping deafness due almost entirely to chronic ear infections has been found in as many as 50 percent of those children under treatment for ear infections at Mount Edgecumbe Hospital and in as many as 8 percent of the students at Wrangell Institute and approximately 4 percent of the students at Mount Edgecumbe School. Only in southeast Alaska has reasonably complete audiometric testing in the village schools been possible through a hearing and speech program of the maternal and child health section of the division of health of the State division of health. This program supervised by Mrs. Henrietta Krantz has revealed an incidence of educationally handicapping deafness less than that mentioned above but still far greater than that found in a population of comparable age in other States.

Fortunately, treatment of chronic ear infection even if of several years duration may produce acceptable hearing. Also, improvements in emergency medical care available in the villages, particularly in the past 3 years, is materially decreasing the number of new cases of otogenic deafness, but these measures cannot eliminate the large number of cases of deafness already discovered and awaiting discovery.

At present, speech therapy and auricular training for most of these deaf children must, in the majority of cases in Alaska, be given by untrained volunteers under the occasional supervision of a qualified teacher of the deaf. This is due much less to lack of funds than to the unavailability of qualified teachers of the deaf, speech pathologists and audiologists. During the next 10 years there will be a particular need in Alaska for people with these professional qualifications.

For these reasons, I trust that you will review with particular care the figures prepared by the division of health regarding the incidence of deafness among Alaska children and that you will give your support to Senate's Joint Resolution 127 and to any comparable resolution introduced in the House.

Very sincerely yours,

DAVID L. SPARLING, M.D.

RESEARCH STUDY ON WHEAT

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, on Thursday of this week I called the Senate's attention to a letter I had written the Honorable Ezra Taft Benson, Secretary of Agriculture, on June 29, urging the Department to undertake a research study with respect to wheat.

The statement I made at that time and a copy of my letter to the Secretary appear on page 15059 on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have just received from the Secretary a reply in regard to my request, and am delighted to inform the Senate that the study I requested has already been started.

In my letter to the Secretary, I requested that a study be made in regard to the relation of wheat to the rest of the economy, through all the stages of growing, transporting, storing, distributing, milling, processing, wholesaling, and retailing.

Wheat is a real problem, and everyone must realize that some action must be taken by Congress in the near future. Therefore, it is essential that we get facts and information that will be helpful as we deal realistically with this problem.

The Secretary is to be commended for his prompt response to this request. Assurance of prompt action is important.

Secretary Benson is sincerely concerned about the situation; and, with his cooperation, this material will be available in the near future.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the Secretary's letter be made a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., July 1, 1960.

Hon FRANK CARLSON,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CARLSON: This will acknowledge your letter of June 29 with reference to undertaking a research study with respect to wheat.

Over the years you have demonstrated a continued concern for the welfare and problems of wheat growers. No one in the Congress has been more keenly aware of the need for a change in the current program.

I deeply appreciate your commendation of the work of the Department of Agriculture in the assembling and analysis of facts regarding wheat and in the expansion of market research activities.

I am sure that you, as one of the earliest sponsors of this program, also recognize the successful food-for-peace program being conducted by the administration with respect to wheat. Under this program over two-thirds of the wheat exports are being moved under special programs, primarily Public Law 480. Wheat exports in the last marketing year exceeded 500 million bushels.

In line with your detailed request, this study has now been started. We shall make every effort to provide the results of this study as early as possible.

Sincerely yours,

E. T. BENSON.

TRIBUTE TO FRANK J. WILSON

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, one of our outstanding former Federal employees, Frank J. Wilson, who devoted practically a lifetime of service to our Government, is now retiring as president of the National Association of Retired Civil Employees.

Mr. Wilson announced last February that his service as president of NARCE would terminate on June 30, and he would turn over his duties as president to the vice president, Joseph L. Spilman.

During Mr. Wilson's 8 years as president, this organization has grown in membership and influence.

As a member of the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee during the entire period of his presidency, I have had the privilege of working closely with him on many problems affecting the welfare of our retired Federal workers. Our association has been most pleasant.

I can assure the Federal workers of the Nation that he was ever diligent in their behalf and he is entitled to the commendation of every one of them.

Mr. Wilson rendered most valuable service in appearing before the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee in behalf of Senate bill 2575, providing health benefit programs for retired Federal employees. It can be definitely stated that had it not been for his active service in its behalf, the bill would not have secured committee and Senate approval.

Mr. Wilson is entitled to a well-earned and well-deserved rest, and my best wishes go with him.

I ask unanimous consent that his farewell message, which appeared in the June issue of Retirement Life, be made a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAREWELL

In the February issue of Retirement Life I announced completion of my service as president on June 30. Hence, this is my farewell message to our more than 100,000 members. Your vice president, Joseph L. Spilman, will take over the duties as president on July 1. I respectfully urge you to give him your wholehearted and your strong support.

I extend to every NARCE member my deep thanks for the friendly cooperation which you have demonstrated during the 8 years I have served you. I will cherish for the remainder of my life the friendship of many NARCE members which I have enjoyed during that period. I trust I may continue to enjoy your friendship. I thank all of my coworkers in the headquarters office for their enthusiastic support. I would feel remiss if I did not especially mention and highly commend the dedicated and efficient service to the association and the loyal cooperation accorded me by the two national officers who also complete their association assignments on June 30 and who served on the headquarters staff with me the longest periods, namely, Secretary John J. Madigan and Treasurer Harry M. Dengler. I wish them many years of happy retirement.

Another fine example of dedicated service was demonstrated by the assistant secretary, Bill Lundgren and the assistant to the secretary, Ella Logsdon. Last December they submitted resignations, but as I was particularly anxious to have their valuable help on legislative and other matters of great importance in promoting the welfare of our members I successfully persuaded them to remain until this time. I also wish them the happy retirement which they have earned.

Insofar as practicable I shall be happy, as an individual, to continue to lend a hand in order to promote the welfare of my fellow NARCE members.

Goodby, good luck, and may God bless you.

Sincerely,

FRANK J. WILSON,
President.

VOLUNTARY PENSION PLANS BY SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, present indications are that no final action will be taken on House bill 10 before we adjourn for the recess.

The Finance Committee spent weeks in hearings, both open and executive, on this bill. The measure has much merit, but there are also some problems involved in writing this type of legislation without creating more injustices or inequalities than are prevalent in existing law.

H.R. 10, as passed by the House of Representatives, approved a principle that would give self-employed people an opportunity to set aside certain portions of their annual incomes for use during their retirement. These seven million to ten million self-employed people in this country represent, for the most part, the solid, courageous, typically farsighted and farseeing American middle class, the continued existence and growth of which make this country different from most, if not all, other countries in the world.

In this bill we are dealing with this group of some seven million or more people, for whom nothing has been done. The proposal is, of course, a voluntary one; and this makes it truly a typical, historical American way of permitting a person to do for himself, which is socially desirable.

I realize that H.R. 10, as amended by the Senate Finance Committee, will not meet with the approval of many who are interested in setting aside some of their present incomes for their retirement years; but it is a step in that direction, and I am hoping that after the bill is passed by the Senate, certain changes can be made in a conference between the House and Senate.

DOCTOR BILLS FORCE ELDERLY COUPLE TO GIVE UP THEIR HOME

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, here is another letter, typical of the hundreds that pour into my office stating the case for medical care for the aged. This is the story of an elderly couple who cannot make ends meet and pay the high medical insurance premiums required of them. They have had their bout with medical bills and have been forced to sell their home and purchase a small, older home. Now they fear they will lose that.

Multiply their plight by thousands upon thousands, and we have part of the picture of what our senior citizens face.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am very interested in the Forand bill and would urge you to do all in your power to support H.R. 4700 as it seems to offer so much for so little increase in social security.

The reason for being interested in this bill is that my husband is now retired. He is past seventy and we have no other income but his social security. I am just sixty and therefore not eligible to receive any social security. We have tried to get insurance but until recently have not found any. The one we found that would insure us without physical examination cost us $9 each a month.

In 1957 my husband spent four weeks in the hospital. The bill was $1,000, besides the doctor bill and the number of office calls and drug bills. Last year we both spent a few weeks in the hospital and I made many calls to the doctor's office. To meet these bills we had to sell our home. We banked part of the money. We bought a small older home, but when that money is gone we will have to go live with our children. We like living alone. We love our children, but know our ways are not their ways. We would not fit in. Therefore we ask you to consider our need. My husband has paid into social security since 1937.

WORLD POPULATION AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—ADDRESS BY FRANCIS O. WILCOX

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, on Friday, April 29, 1960, Assistant Secretary of State Francis O. Wilcox made an interesting and informative address before the Tenth Annual Conference of the International Association of Personnel Women at the Statler-Hilton Hotel in New York City. The speech had to do with the problems of the increasing birth rate in the world and the exploding population.

I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD POPULATION AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

(Address by the Hon. Francis O. Wilcox, Assistant Secretary of State for International Organization Affairs)

INTRODUCTORY COMMENTS

Before I finish reading this sentence—and it will take about 10 seconds—31 new babies will be born into the world. Every week 1.8 million births occur. Every hour brings 11,000 new mouths to feed.

In fact there is a race going on in the world today whose outcome may be as fateful in history as the atomic bomb or the sputnik. Its outcome will affect us all—and our way of life—for generations to come. This race is between the rapid growth of population in the less-developed countries and the struggle of these peoples for economic progress and a better life.

NATURE OF THE POPULATION EXPLOSION

This startling phenomenon, "the population explosion," as it is often called, arises primarily from medicine's advanced techniques of "death control." Medical discoveries of the past few decades have made possible sensational reductions in the death rate. The systematic, large-scale use of antibiotics, sulfa drugs, DDT and other insecticides has led to control of infectious diseases to an extent and with a speed previously impossible.

In some less-developed countries death rates have falled at a tremendous rate—three to five times as fast as they did in the 19th century Europe.

The tropical island of Ceylon provides a dramatic demonstration of how a public health program can cause a sensational decline in the death rate. In 1946 the Ceylonese authorities, in cooperation with the World Health Organization of the United Nations, launched a vigorous health campaign, principally to stamp out malaria through the use of DDT. The death rate fell amazingly—30 percent in 1 year. From almost 20 deaths per thousand in 1946, it fell to slightly above 10 a thousand in 1957—which is comparable to that prevailing in the Western World.

Meanwhile, almost all the less-developed countries have had an annual birth rate in excess of 40 births per thousand. Even birth rates of 45 per thousand are by no means extraordinary in the Middle East and Latin America.

With death rates falling and birth rates remaining at a very high level, the tempo of population growth has been rising sharply. The almost 2 billion people who inhabit the world's less-developed regions are increasing their numbers, on the average, by as much as 2 percent a year. This rate, if continued, would double the population in 35 years.

While estimates beyond the 1970's become ever more speculative, United Nations experts state that:

"* * * barring either a catastrophe, or a deterioration of social conditions for progress in health, of global proportions, a world population of between 6 billion and 7 billion by the end of the century should now be expected as a matter of practical certainty."

It is significant that most of the future increase in world population will take place in the less-developed areas of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. These are regions where, in general, population already presses very heavily upon available resources.

That the world's population may grow from less than 3 billion today to 6 or 7 billion by the end of the century is not in itself so disquieting; what is disquieting is that most of this expansion will take place among those people who are already living at subsistence levels—and that it may take place within the short span of 40 years.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE POPULATION EXPLOSION

These possibilities raise difficult questions: How are the less-developed areas to achieve economic and social improvement, without which political freedom loses much of its meaning? Can economic and social development come fast enough in the next four decades to prevent deplorably low living standards from falling even further behind?

Here we face a very discouraging fact. Already some less-developed areas are finding it difficult to keep their economies expanding as rapidly as their population. The per capita product in Latin America is now rising more slowly than during the early postwar years. And, in most of Asia and Africa, there has been only modest improvement in living standards despite the intensive programs of economic development that have been carried on for more than a decade in some of these countries. Food production seems to be falling behind or barely keeping pace with population growth in several countries of Southeast Asia, Africa, and in some parts of Latin America. Though they may plant more acres and grow more food, there are always more people to feed.

Rapid population growth can, in itself, seriously hinder the economic and social development of low-income countries.

The faster the population grows, the greater the importance of increasing the rate of technological improvements if even the existing level of production per worker is to be maintained. In less-developed countries where the margin of income over subsistence needs is very narrow, it is all but impossible to save and invest enough for economic development to proceed at a satisfactory pace, even if the population were standing still.

A comparison of per capita income in the less-developed countries and in the industrialized West may indicate why it is so very difficult, in less-developed countries, to accumulate capital.

According to a recent study, one and a quarter billion people in 100 less-developed countries and territories of the free world have an annual per capita income of about $100. The corresponding figure for the United States is $2,100.

In the decade from 1950 to 1960 incomes in these less-developed countries increased at the rate of 3 percent a year—while population grew at the rate of 2 percent a year. Consequently per capita income increased only 1 percent a year—the equivalent of one American dollar. Can anyone but a confirmed optimist believe that such a snail-like pace could bring any noticeable improvement in living standards and capital savings?

Contrasted with the United States the figures are even more shocking. While the per capita income in the less-developed countries increased by only $10 in 10 years, it rose by $225 in our country in the 7 years from 1950 to 1957. It also rose by more than $200, in the same period, in six countries of Western Europe.

Not only is there an enormous gap between incomes, living standards, and opportunities for savings in the Western World and the less-developed areas, but the gap continues to widen. While advancing, the tortoise keeps falling further and further behind. Forced to expend their limited resources on current consumption, the underprivileged peoples see their plans for a substantial betterment in their economic and social conditions seriously jeopardized unless sufficient help comes from the outside.

POPULATION CONTROL

These discouraging circumstances have led to repeated suggestions that only population control can cope with the problems brought on by the population explosion. Furthermore, some people predict that, if there is not deliberate modification of population trends, there is scant hope that economic development in low-income countries will outdistance population increase.

Those who held this view do not favor reducing birth rates as a substitute for economic development. On the contrary, they advocate ever increasing production as the primary solution to the problems of poverty. They do fear, however, that these problems will prove insoluble—even with economic growth and development—unless there is some check on population expansion. In proposing planned reduction in the birth rate, they seek to accelerate the speed with which economic advance can provide better living standards. Otherwise, they fear that the rapidly increasing millions in the economically less fortunate areas of the world will be forever condemned to their treadmill of frustration and despair.

On the other hand, there are many people who argue that economic development will alone suffice to meet the challenge. Exponents of this position contend that birth control is not only repugnant to many people because of religious beliefs but is essentially a negative response. They insist that population pressures may be eased by positive economic, social and political measures, such as development of natural resources, promotion of education and introduction of modern industrial methods.

This is not the place to examine in detail these divergent viewpoints. President Eisenhower has made clear that, insofar as the U.S. Government is concerned, it is for the governments and peoples of other countries to reach their own decisions on what population policy they may wish to follow. It is for them to work out their own policies and programs within the framework of their own religions, traditions and cultures.

The United Nations has also scrupulously avoided any suggestion of intervention in the population policies of its member states. At the same time it has undertaken comprehensive population studies and established facilities in India and Chile for demographic research. Whatever measures the concerned countries may adopt to deal with the issues arising from rapidly expanding population, it should be very helpful for them to have the demographic facts at their disposal.

THE CHALLENGE TO AID THE LESS-DEVELOPED AREAS

The straits in which these growing populations find themselves as they strive for advancement are not omens of the inevitable futility of their efforts, nor the hopelessness of their aspirations. They do, however, make inescapably clear that the vicious circle of poverty engendering poverty can be broken only with outside help. This prodigious challenge—this unparalleled opportunity—to aid the underprivileged peoples of the world to triumph over povery, disease and ignorance, and may I add, over subversion from within and without, is one which the United States and the United Nations have been glad to accept.

The challenge has been accepted for a number of compelling reasons.

First of all, we have answered it because it presents a great moral issue. On this ever smaller globe, we are inextricably involved with all mankind. We cannot view with detachment the desperate struggle of our fellow men to free themselves and their children from the oppression of want and disease and ignorance—when we know that our help, and the help of other men of good will, is so important to the success of their struggle. Enjoying ourselves a measure of liberty and well-being unknown in history, we cannot but view their strivings with compassion and concern—and grasp the opportunity to aid them to progress in freedom.

As President Eisenhower has stated, our assistance to the less-developed nations is founded on this proposition:

"The achievement of a peace which is just depends upon promoting a rate of world economic progress, particularly among the peoples of the less developed nations, which will inspire hope for the fulfillment of their aspirations."

Among the underprivileged peoples there are many who have found that political freedom is a qualified boon—if unaccompanied by a satisfactory measure of economic advance. The determination, the very impatience, of hundreds of millions of newly independent Asians and Africans to share in the material blessings of the modern age exerts tremendous pressure on their leaders to accomplish economic and social improvement. If such benefits cannot be obtained in an environment of freedom, they may well be sought through the harsh totalitarianism of communism.

You can be sure that the challenge which the aspirations of these newly emerged areas offer the free world and the Communist world is fully appreciated in the Kremlin. Already the Sino-Soviet bloc has agreed to furnish some $4 billion in grants and credits to those less-developed countries, carefully selected, on which it is centering its campaign of political and economic penetration. Thousands of technicians have been sent to these countries, their number in 1959 being estimated at 4,700. The bloc has also given special attention to enlarging its trade with these same countries—and with marked success. All this is an integral part of Soviet policy as reflected in Mr. Khrushchev's blunt announcement to us in 1957: "We declare war on you in the peaceful field of trade. We will win over the United States."

However, it is a serious mistake to assume—as some people do—that our foreign aid program emerged primarily as a response to the Communist threat. I am convinced that the United States would be engaged in extensive foreign aid activity if Marx and Engel had never lived or if there were not a single Communist left on the face of the earth.

THE U.S. RESPONSE TO THE CHALLENGE

What is our answer to this challenge? What are we in the United States—and our free world associates in the United Nations—doing to help the less-developed areas help themselves to progress? It is an important objective of U.S. foreign policy to help these countries achieve satisfactory economic growth so that they may preserve their freedom and develop into stable, effective societies.

The task of aiding these nations is, however, so tremendous, in terms of both capital and imagination that it calls for the cooperative efforts of all the economically advanced nations of the free world. We have sought therefore to channel a substantial share of our assistance to the less-developed areas through the United Nations and other multilateral organizations. At the same time, we have made a massive governmental response, on a bilateral basis, principally through the mutual security program.

The purpose of the mutual security program is to help other people to help themselves. We seek to aid them in developing political and economic systems which will achieve enough self-generating vitality to sustain further progress under their own power.

Our help in developing the human skills so lacking in the less-developed countries and in making available the knowledge and expertise of our civilization is furnished largely through technical assistance programs. Thousands of American experts are working overseas in more than 60 nations in agriculture, education, public health, and many other fields. These men and women are working with the peoples of other nations to develop their skills and economies—and thus to give substance to their aspirations.

Speaking about these Americans overseas, may I say just a word about "The Ugly American." In my judgment, this book—through isolated examples and other distortions—has belittled the character and capacity of our representatives abroad.

Thousands of able Americans have done—and are doing—an outstanding job all over the world. In remote posts where health hazards are constant, school facilities for their children lacking, and recreational opportunities limited, these Americans are making real sacrifices for this country. And, in the vast majority of cases, they accept hardships with quiet grace and fit well into an alien and often trying environment.

Our help in material resources, in the financing of development, is furnished in the form of both grant and loan assistance. In addition, the United States continues to be the chief contributor of assistance through the United Nations, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund, and other international bodies. Since the United Nations establishment in 1945, the United States has contributed $3.3 billion to the United Nations, its specialized agencies, other than the Bank and the Fund, and voluntary programs.

Certainly no one can accuse our country of pinching pennies in connection with our foreign aid programs. If we add to the Marshall plan and the mutual security program, the contributions we have made through the U.S. Export-Import Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund and various other types of assistance, our total foreign aid since 1945 approximates $72 billion. This figure ought to be clear proof of our deep interest in helping to build a prosperous and peaceful world.

Fortunately, we are entering a period when some of our allies and associates, particularly in Western Europe, have recovered their economic health and are able to do progressively more in assisting these economic development needs. Therefore, when we look to the future of external assistance to the less-developed countries, we can envisage the prospect of greater contributions from other governments and the greater use of multilateral arrangements for the execution of this aid. We also look forward to an increasing flow of private capital from these countries to the less-developed regions of the world, in addition to that from the United States.

THE UNITED NATIONS' RESPONSE TO THE CHALLENGE

The nature and amount of U.S. assistance to the less-developed countries are probably more familiar to you than are the character and scope of aid extended through the United Nations and its specialized agencies. We might well, therefore, turn our attention to some of the representative accomplishments of this latter group.

Before doing so, however, I might note that, curiously enough, there are still a few people who are critical of the fact that our Government gives some of its aid through the United Nations. There are at least three very sound reasons for doing so.

1. The United States has found aid through United Nations' channels to be an advantageous complement to our own bilateral aid programs. When we can share costs with 80 other countries, it is obviously far cheaper than if we were to carry the entire burden alone.

2. Utilization of the growing United Nations pool of manpower and training resources helps speed up economic development—which is our basic goal. Moreover, our supply of American experts is inadequate to meet all the needs of the less-developed areas.

3. Many of the less-developed countries, some of whom are jealous of their newly won sovereignty, prefer aid through the United Nations for political reasons. They are inclined to look upon United Nations' programs as cooperative ventures in which all member countries, no matter what their size or wealth, have a voice and most of them make a contribution.

The needs of the less-developed areas have naturally determined the character of assistance rendered by the United Nations and its specialized agencies. These requirements have been, above all, for technical know-how, for capital investment and for good health and adequate nutrition.

UNITED NATIONS PROGRAM OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

No less urgent than the low-income countries' needs for capital are their needs for trained manpower. Only a small number of their people have gained an education, only a few have held positions of responsibility. So, there are pressing requirements for people trained in the managerial, technical, and vocational skills essential to development programs.

To help provide these skills, the United Nations technical assistance program has sent 8,000 experts of 77 nationalities to assist 145 countries and territories in their economic development.

I would like to point out that this assistance program is by no means a one-way street. While receiving aid themselves, many less-developed countries have at the same time provided experts for assignment elsewhere. In one recent year, an Asian country received 146 experts and provided 109 of her own experts for other countries. What began as technical assistance has become technical cooperation on a worldwide scale.

Some critics still argue that the United States contributes more than its fair share of the United Nations technical assistance program. It is true that we took the initiative in setting up the program. It is true, too, that we have continued to play the leading role in its support. In all fairness, however, I should point out that a number of countries contribute substantially more per capita than we do. They include Canada, Denmark, Sweden, Norway and the Netherlands.

In fact the total contributions we make to all United Nations activities cost each American only 61 cents a year. In view of the highly important role of the United Nations in improving living standards in many lands and in maintaining world peace, this is without doubt the cheapest insurance this country could possibly buy.

UNITED NATIONS SPECIAL FUND

If managerial and technical skills are prerequisites for economic development, still they must be accompanied by sufficient capital investment to produce tangible progress.

If the less developed countries are to raise their standards of production and consumption, the output per worker—on the farm and in the factory—must be increased. This means adding mechanical power to muscle power. It means capital investment in creating power supplies, building factories, and developing natural resources.

To encourage capital investment in the low-income countries, the United Nations Special Fund finances natural resources surveys, applied research, and technical training. It does not itself provide funds for capital investment, but it does open doors to productive investment.

Special Fund surveys have concentrated on discovering natural wealth in the less-developed countries. These surveys have been intensive studies of the feasibility of bringing large areas of land into agricultural production, harnessing rivers for electricity, opening up mineral deposits and developing large-scale fishing industries.

In its efforts to facilitate new investments and to improve technical skills, the Special Fund applies sound business criteria. It assists countries to help themselves; it shares rather than bear the costs.

The Special Fund's activities are a recent supplement to those of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund, the International Finance Corporation and the proposed International Development Association. These multilateral institutions—under United Nations auspices—are instrumental in helping the less-developed countries to obtain capital and maintain monetary stability.

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

Essential to the sustained hard work required for economic and social achievement are good health and adequate food. A people weakened by malnutrition and debilitated by illness cannot meet—either in terms of physical effort or creative thought—the great tasks that confront them.

If all the earth's millions sat down together at one gigantic dinner table, more than half of them would leave hungry after the meal.

That, in effect, is how the FAO, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, pictures the world food situation. The problem is how to fill existing plates more adequately and at the same time fill new plates for the more than 100,000 persons being added to the world's population every day.

Toward solving this problem, the world must use its lands and seas and other resources more efficiently. The job of FAO is to help realize this—by modernizing farming methods, enriching the soil, using better seeds, working out irrigation and flood control systems, expanding livestock herds, controlling plant and animal diseases and improving fishing methods. For example, along the Red Sea coast of the Sudan, fishing techniques taught by FAO experts led to a fivefold increase in the fish catch. In Egypt, FAO introduced improved varieties of seed and better cultivation methods—with the result that rice production more than doubled in 4 years.

Notwithstanding the efforts of FEO and of government programs all over the world, the problem of hunger has by no means been solved. The experience of industrially advanced countries demonstrates, however, that by application of scientific methods and proper management of the national economy, productivity can be raised to heights hitherto believed unattainable. Improved agricultural tools and machinery, rational use of fertilizers, farm credit and marketing arrangements can bring about a radical change in the present low-yielding practices of many lands. Moreover, soil scientists believe that there are great possibilities of increasing the area of land now under cultivation through irrigation and reclamation.

The problem of adequate food supplies for the world's growing millions springs, therefore, not so much from an intrinsic lack of nature's gifts or human resources as from an inadequate response. To arouse public consciousness regarding the world's food problem and to turn apathy into significant action, the FAO will officially launch on July 1 of this year a freedom-from-hunger campaign. The heart of the campaign will be national action programs designed to increase food production, improve its nutritive quality, prevent food losses, increase effectiveness in distribution and stimulate better food habits.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

In view of the difficulties in providing the peoples of the less developed areas with adequate food, some people may be tempted to ask whether improving health standards, saving lives, and increasing the lifespan are really helping solve the population problem—or whether the net effect of such humanitarianism is to intensify the pressure of population upon resources.

To this question, I would say, first of all, that belief in the dignity and worth of the individual is one of the basic values of our democracy. To deny to any man the priceless boon of good health—a vital prerequisite to the good life and the realization of his potentialities—would be unthinkable.

Quite apart, however, from any moral consideration, it is obvious that a healthy, vigorous people is essential to national progress and results in increased productivity. Those who are weakened by recurring attacks of malaria, crippled by yaws, wasted by tuberculosis, can contribute very little—if anything—to economic and social development.

To give the world's underprivileged peoples health and strength to work for their own betterment, the World Health Organization, WHO, has done much since its establishment 12 years ago under United Nations auspices. It has given first priority to an effective control of major communicable diseases, man's ancient scourges. The less-developed nations, with aid and guidance from WHO and the United States, have made a magnificent onslaught against them. Malaria has been reduced by 50 percent, from 300 million to 150 million cases a year. Substantial progress has also been made in combating other scourges—yaws, yellow fever, leprosy, trachoma, smallpox and tuberculosis.

Besides its campaigns against mass infectious diseases, WHO is building the enduring bases of good health. This it does through assistance in public health administration, maternal and child health, public health nursing, environmental sanitation and, most basic of all, in training. The worldwide services of WHO are constantly increasing in value to the less-developed areas.

CONCLUDING COMMENT

In brief compass, then, we have seen that the population explosion confronts the entire world with a challenge of the first magnitude.

Our own response, and that of our free world associates, to the underprivileged peoples' aspirations—for freedom from want, disease, and ignorance—inspires confidence that man will prove master, not victim, of his environment.

Heartening as the results of this worldwide cooperation are, formidable tasks have yet to be accomplished. Above all, economic growth must proceed at a faster rate if the race between economic progress and advancing population is to be won.

Personally I do not believe there is any danger that the world's population explosion will lead to anything like large-scale starvation. It will, however, make exceedingly difficult the task of raising the living standards of people in the less-developed areas.

Simply put, world production must increase faster than people. The total world product must be increased so that the economic pie can be cut into big enough slices for everyone.

Toward this end, certain measures are of high priority. Let me mention a few.

1. A larger flow of private capital into the less-developed areas must be stimulated. Private capital is an indispensable supplement to funds made available by governments and by international agencies. In this respect, the less-developed areas have a special responsibility to create a favorable climate so as to encourage the inflow of private capital under terms which are equitable to them and to private investors.

On this point, the less-developed countries should labor under no illusions. People with money to invest are not going to send it to faraway lands unless they are given reasonably attractive investment opportunities.

2. An expanding international trade—in a dynamic world economy—must be fostered and encouraged. The less-developed countries, owing to a dearth of local capital, rely heavily on what they can earn from their sales abroad to finance economic development. They depend on these earnings to pay for most of their imports of capital equipment and industrial materials. Trade is every whit as important as aid.

3. Technical cooperation must be continued and expanded. A healthy, well-trained labor force—skilled in modern agricultural, industrial, and managerial techniques—is essential to maximum utilization of human and physical resources.

4. On the part of the less-developed countries, there should be full realization that their economic destiny, no less than their political future, rests primarily in their own hands. On their own effort, sacrifice, and initiative will hang victory or defeat in their battle against old-age misery. Well-wishers overseas can help but they cannot supply these essential elements of success.

5. Finally, when we survey the vast opportunities for development activities everywhere, we cannot but regret the stupendous burden of world armaments. In the next decade, the nations of the world may well spend more than $1,000 billion on arms. How much could be accomplished in so many areas if only a small percentage of this vast outlay could be turned to more constructive purposes.

On our part, we have told the world that, when sufficient progress is made on internationally supervised disarmament, the United States stands ready to join with other nations in allotting a portion of savings from disarmament to a multilateral development fund. Somehow, the nations of the world must find a way, under a foolproof system of disarmament, to divert their wealth from military expenditures to economic and social needs—their own and those of their neighbors.

We can all agree that the way to meet the world's population problem is not to blast our teeming billions from the face of the earth in a nuclear war. We must beat our weapons into pruning hooks and plowshares so that people everywhere can have the opportunity to live in peace and in plenty.

The less-developed countries' achievement of social and economic advance—under free institutions—is an accomplishment in which we all may share and in which we may all benefit. We have no choice but to join this global struggle for economic growth in freedom. For we know that only in a peaceful and flourishing community of free nations, in which human beings everywhere may enjoy maximum opportunity for a better life, can we, too, find security and maintain prosperity.

U.S. FOREIGN POLICY UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60—REPORT BY SENATOR BRIDGES

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, our foreign policy during the past 8 years, under the Republican administration, has served magnificently, and it has kept the peace.

The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] has written a concise report on our foreign policy from 1953 to date. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. FOREIGN POLICY UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

(By U.S. Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire)

The accomplishments of the Republican administration in the field of foreign affairs reflect the basic purpose of our foreign policy: to preserve and enhance the security and freedom of the United States.

In our efforts to create a more stable world order, the United States has sought to:

(a) Strengthen collective security.

(b) Deter the use of force.

(c) Create international status in new frontiers of activity.

(d) Progress toward safeguarded arms control.

(e) Promote negotiation of outstanding international disputes.

(f) Help make the United Nations more effective.

(g) Make of the interdependence of a shrunken world a force for peace rather than a breeding ground for war.

U.S. foreign policy—whether it be considered good or considered bad—makes itself felt in every city, town, and hamlet of this great Republic. Our military posture, our domestic prosperity—in fact, our very survival as a nation—are all affected by success or failure in the conduct of our foreign relations.

Under Republican leadership our foreign policy is based on an alert awareness of reality. Certainly all Americans—regardless of political party—want the necessary armed strength and preparedness. Certainly all Americans also know that we must not dissipate our economic strength in a wild variety of crash programs.

Many of us have warned for years—and today—and at every opportunity—that at home and abroad we face the challenge of those who would destroy us by Marxian or brute power. Even a process of sugar-coating each socialistic pill would produce a devastating narcotic effect upon once free men.

We must remember that the big Red spider of communism has strung a barbed wire fence around one-third of the earth's surface.

We must remember that we cannot appease the hunger of communism by throwing it great chunks of free people and free lands.

We must remember to beware of those who would preach the siren doctrine of easy coexistence.

We must remember that "peace at any price" means the ultimate communization of the world.

With these reminders, the United States, during the past 7½ years under the Republican administration, has performed notably in the following fields of foreign policy:

COLLECTIVE SECURITY

Since 1953, under the leadership of the United States, the free world system of collective security has been substantially strengthened.

Some 50 countries are now associated with the United States in regional or bilateral security pacts.

No member nation of this collective security system has been engulfed by international communism.

These security arrangements no longer assume the aspect of mere military alliances.

They are the framework of consultative processes that day by day are steadily reforming the society of free nations.

Our collective security pacts are not mere expedients. They introduce a fresh concept into the structure of world order.

During the past 7 years NATO has evolved into an effective military and political instrument enabling the Atlantic Community to thwart Soviet efforts to dominate Western Europe.

The development of political consultation in NATO in recent years under the Republican administration has demonstrated that interdependence is not merely an empty symbol but a practical necessity for free world survival.

As proposed by the United States, NATO is now engaged in a planning effort addressed to the next 10 years.

In 1954, by the Manila Pact, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization was created to strengthen the determination and capability of the nations of that area to resist the expansionist thrusts of Communist China. In recent years, certain nations of the area which are not members of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization have come to understand and appreciate its importance for the preservation of freedom.

The Anzus Treaty which has strengthened the close ties between Australia, New Zealand, and the United States, is another illustration of how our security alliances contribute immensely to the development of common purposes in other fields than military.

In 1954 at the 10th Inter-American Conference at Caracas, there was promulgated the "Declaration of Solidarity" of the American States. It declared that the domination or control by the international Communist movement of the political institutions of any American state would threaten us all and endanger the peace of the Americas.

During recent years, the Organization of American States has further developed as an instrument of hemispheric cooperation. The August 1959 Conference of the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics in Santiago clearly demonstrated the determination of these republics to maintain peace in the hemisphere through common action on problems creating international tensions.

An outstanding example of this common action came in early 1959 when Panama was threatened by revolution fomented outside her borders. Prompt action by the Inter-American Peace Commission was an important factor in ending this threat.

The United States is working continuously with the other American Republics in the Organization of American States and in the Inter-American Peace Commission to reduce international tensions in this hemisphere, particularly in the Caribbean area where they are now most acute.

In the Middle East, the United States, although not a member, has strongly supported the Baghdad Pact organization which was established in 1955. Although the Government of Iraq recently indicated its withdrawal, this organization—now known as the Central Treaty Organization—remains a solid instrument of collective security for the northern tier of states in the Middle East.

The joint congressional resolution on the Middle East helped the administration to provide prompt economic and military aid to Jordan and to meet through bilateral agreements the need for renewed evidence of U.S. support for Iran, Pakistan, and Turkey.

The situation in the Middle East today is clearly improved as compared with 1958 as a result of actions by the United States, United Nations, and the states in the area.

With American support, Germany has made a rapid economic recovery and is now among our strongest allies.

In France, we are witnessing an inspiring example of national renewal.

Free China's extraordinary economic development is a symbol to the entire Far East of how much more freedom can do to improve the lot of people than can slavery.

The building of strength in freedom in these countries, many of them in chaos only a few years ago, is an inspiring success, not only for them, but for U.S. policies which have contributed so much to this result.

DETERRENCE OF FORCE

Under the Republican administration, the United States has by its conduct sought to establish the principle of renunciation of aggressive force and has shown its ability and will to deter such use of force by others.

At the time of the Suez episode in 1956 and the Israeli-Egyptian hostilities, the United Kingdom and France, and then Israel, withdrew their armed forces and accepted a United Nations solution.

When Lebanon considered itself threatened from without and appealed to the United States for emergency aid, we responded with promptness and efficiency. When the emergency was relieved, we promptly withdrew our forces.

In the Far East, the Chinese Communists, with Soviet backing, initiated military action designed, as they put it, to "expel the United States" from the Western Pacific. We stood beside the Republic of China in their successful resistance to that attack. We have refused to recognize Red China, and strongly oppose the admittance of Red China to the U.N.

In 1959, when the freedom and independence of Laos were threatened, the United States supported the establishment of a United Nations Security Council subcommittee to proceed to Laos. This international group succeeded by its presence in contributing to easing a potentially dangerous situation. We hope the U.N. can continue to turn back any possible aggressor against Laos.

The United States and Japan signed a new security treaty providing more equitable and workable relationships with this important Far Eastern ally. This treaty was concluded despite the mounting in Japan of one of the most intensive international Communist campaigns ever organized. This international Communist effort evidences the importance to the free world of the close ties which our policy has built between the United States and Japan.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

President Eisenhower has sought acceptance of one facet of international law. This is where national control has not yet entrenched itself, and where the nations might seek some international status in certain areas.

However, whether the promises of the leaders of international communism can even be remotely relied upon remains to be seen.

Three U.S. proposals exemplify the international approach.

1. Polar areas: In April 1958, the United States proposed in the United Nations Security Council a system of international inspection of the Arctic area to reduce the danger of surprise attack over the north polar region and to reduce the danger of miscalculation. This proposal was vetoed by the Soviet Union.

In May 1958, the United States proposed that the countries which heretofore have shown particular interest in Antarctica, including the Soviet Union, join in negotiating a treaty to guarantee the peaceful use of Antarctica and continue international scientific cooperation there. That treaty was signed by the United States and 11 other nations December 1, 1959, guaranteeing by an effective and unprecedented system of inspection that this vast area will be used solely for peaceful purposes. The treaty is now in process of ratification by the several nations.

2. Atoms for peace: In his famous address at the United Nations on December 8, 1953, President Eisenhower proposed a method to "find the way by which the miraculous inventiveness of man shall not be dedicated to his death, but consecrated to his life."

Under the atoms-for-peace program, the United States has negotiated bilateral agreements with some 40 nations. Research reactor grants have been approved for 17 nations. Negotiations are under way with others. We have developed close and constructive relations with EURATOM, the Atomic Energy Community of France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, proposed by the Republican administration, was designed to promote peaceful uses of atomic energy around the world. It was finally established in 1957. It gives some promise of the beginnings of an international approach to the problems of atomic energy.

3. Outer space: In January 1958, President Eisenhower proposed to the Soviet Union "that we agree that outer space should be used only for peaceful purposes. We face a decisive moment in history in relation to this matter." This bilateral proposal was subsequently advanced in the broader forum of the United Nations, since it is of concern to all nations, and an ad hoc committee on peaceful uses of outer space was created.

The Soviet Union at first refused to participate, but eventually joined in December 1959 a United Nations 24-member committee on the peaceful uses of outer space. This committee is to study feasible means for giving effect to programs in peaceful uses of outer space and to make preparations for a possible international conference in 1960 or 1961. Here again we must be watchful of moves made by Communist leaders.

DISARMAMENT

In August 1957, the United States, together with the United Kingdom, France, and Canada, submitted a comprehensive arms control proposal to the Soviet Union which, if implemented, would constitute a step toward what might some day be the goal of general disarmament. This proposal had four basic parts:

1. It proposed that the Soviet Union join in inaugurating a system of inspection to provide dependable safeguards against large-scale surprise attack.

2. It proposed a threefold move in relation to nuclear weapons:

(a) Cessation of the production of fissionable material for nuclear weapons.

(b) A system whereby existing nuclear weapons stockpiles could be gradually reduced by transfers to peaceful uses.

(c) A tentative suspension of nuclear testing.

3. It proposed a start on reducing and regulating conventional armaments and armed forces.

4. It proposed the working out of a system to insure that outer space missiles would be used exclusively for peaceful and scientific purposes.

The Soviet Union did not even care to discuss our proposals at that time.

In 1958 President Eisenhower proposed a conference of Soviet and Western experts, which quickly agreed on the nature of measures required to control an international agreement to suspend nuclear testing. Political negotiations have been under way for some time in an effort to translate these technical possibilities into dependable realities. To give the negotiations time to succeed, the President extended the previous U.S. unilateral suspension of nuclear tests.

The President has also proposed that, if the negotiations cannot agree on procedures to inspect a complete test suspension, a preliminary agreement might be concluded suspending nuclear tests in the atmosphere and under water.

These negotiations continue, but their outcome is dependent on the willingness of the Soviet Union to reach a meaningful agreement.

Technical discussions were also undertaken in 1958, at the suggestion of the President, to seek definition of measures required to lessen the danger of surprise attack. These discussions resulted in a clearer understanding of each side's position but, because of Soviet intransigence, no substantial progress was achieved.

In the summer of 1959 the United States, United Kingdom, and France proposed to the Soviet Union that disarmament negotiations be resumed by these four powers and that certain other states be invited to participate.

This proposal was accepted and the 10-Nation Disarmament Commission began meeting at Geneva in March of this year.

The Western Powers presented to the 10-Nation Commission a 3-phase safeguarded arms reduction program which could lead to the goal of general disarmament. This Disarmament Commission is continuing its deliberations. Whether it will make substantial progress depends on the willingness of the Soviets to accept a safeguarded and verifiable arms control arrangement.

INTERNATIONAL NEGOTIATION

Arab-Israeli dispute: In August 1955 Secretary of State Dulles with specific authority from President Eisenhower, proposed a program for progress toward resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute. In involved three points:

1. Possible substantial participation by the United States in a loan to assist Israel to pay compensation to refugees.

2. Possible U.S. participation in formal treaty engagements to prevent or thwart any effort by either side to alter by force the boundaries between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

3. Possible U.S. help in reconciling the vital interests of all the parties in the matter of boundary definition.

India-Pakistan dispute: The United States has encouraged and assisted the World Bank in its effort to negotiate a just settlement of the serious dispute between India and Pakistan over the Indus Waters.

Negotiations with the Communists: Every reasonable and decent effort has been made to find a modus vivendi with the Communists. In an effort to reduce the danger of general war—

1. We made the Korean armistice which ended the hostilities in Korea.

2. We participated in the Geneva Conference of 1954 which ended the hostilities in Indochina.

3. We continue to seek in the Warsaw talks with the Chinese Communists to assure that in the Taiwan area force should not be relied upon by either side to bring about the reunification of China.

4. We have joined with the Soviet Union in concluding the Austrian Peace Treaty which liberated Austria.

5. In 1955, President Eisenhower met with the Soviet leaders at the summit in Geneva. At that time, he presented his famous "open skies" proposal which, had it been accepted by the Soviet Union, would have gone a long way to reducing the danger of a great surprise attack.

6. In 1958, we made a comprehensive agreement with the Soviet Union for exchanges in the fields of culture, technology, and education. This agreement operated successfully for 2 years and recently has been extended for 2 more.

We shall continue our endeavor to bring home to the people of the U.S.S.R. a true picture of the United States. Vice President NIXON'S trip to the Soviet Union last year served to emphasize directly to the Soviet people the desire of the United States for peace and friendship.

7. In November 1958, the Soviet Union threatened to take unilateral action against Western rights in Berlin by May 1959 unless the three Western Powers accepted the Soviet proposal for a so-called free city. The United States, United Kingdom, and France refused, with full NATO support, to compromise their rights or to negotiate under duress. When the Soviet Union then indicated that its deadline was of no particular significance, the three Western Powers agreed to negotiate concerning the question of Germany, including Berlin and a peace treaty, at a foreign ministers' conference. Secretary of State Herter spent 10 weeks in Geneva in 1959 seeking a settlement of the German problem and, failing that, of a modus vivendi on Berlin. This conference clarified and narrowed the differences with the Soviet Union but did not produce agreement.

Negotiating with the Soviet Union is long, hard work—if there can be any worthiness in negotiating with the Russian leaders and, at that, it is difficult to trust them. Months of careful planning went into the preparation by the Western Powers for the summit conference scheduled for May 16, 1960, which the U.S.S.R. would not even allow to take place. Even though it did not take place, the Soviet's abrupt rupture of the meeting increased the solidarity of our alliances. In his report to the American people on this development, President Eisenhower made these three points:

"First. We must keep up our strength, and hold it steady for the long pull—a strength not neglected in complacency nor overbuilt in hysteria. So doing, we can make it clear to everyone that there can be no gain in the use of pressure tactics or aggression against us or our allies.

"Second. We must continue businesslike dealings with the Soviet leaders on outstanding issues, and improve the contacts between our own and the Soviet peoples, making clear that the path of reason and commonsense is still open if the Soviets will but use it.

"Third. To improve world conditions in which human freedom can flourish, we must continue to move ahead with positive programs at home and abroad, in collaboration with free nations everywhere. In doing so, we shall continue to give our strong support to the United Nations and the great principles for which it stands."

In discussing this refusal of the Soviets to allow the summit meeting to take place at Paris, Secretary Herter said on May 27:

"We intend to go ahead with existing negotiations, to stand by our commitments and to foster open communication and peaceful exchanges. Above all, we shall not cease from the most determined, patient, resourceful endeavor to find ways to bring the arms race under control and thus to meet the nuclear menace that hangs over mankind.

"I hope that we will not become so fixed in preoccupation with the Soviet challenge as to lose sight of our own constructive purposes—which are larger and more important than merely resisting or reacting to external threats. We have our own vision of the future toward which we want to see the world evolve. We have our own programs for helping to bring that future about—for holding high the light of freedom, for sharing its message and rewards with emerging nations, for trying to create an international community in which the rule of law will replace the rule of force."

We can recall that it took about 3 years of negotiation with the Soviet Union to create the International Atomic Energy Agency, 2½ years for the Cultural Exchange Agreement, 8 years and 400 meetings for the Austrian State Treaty.

The real truth is that the Russian leaders wrecked the scheduled summit meeting because they discovered they would not be able to get all kinds of concessions like they did at Yalta and Potsdam.

UNITED NATIONS

In the last 7 years, the United States has repeatedly taken the lead in trying to strengthen the United Nations and the processes of international cooperation which the United Nations represents. A few examples follow:

1. In December 1953, President Eisenhower proposed the "Atoms for Peace" program to the United Nations.

2. In the economic field, we played a leading role in bringing about two new entities linked with the United Nations: the International Finance Corporation and the Special Fund. The International Finance Corporation, which came into being in July 1956 as an affiliate of the World Bank, invests in private enterprise abroad, thus stimulating the vital private sector of developing economies. The Special Fund, which was set up by the United Nations General Assembly, provides funds for broad regional and basic technical assistance and survey projects more extensive than those financed by the United Nations technical assistance program. We must carefully watch these U.N. operations lest we lose one bit of our national sovereignty, plus large sums of money.

3. The United States also took the lead at the United Nations General Assembly in creating a committee on outer space. The activities of that committee, we hope, may contribute to the peaceful and cooperative exploration of this new dimension in human experience.

4. At the same time, we have continued to try to strengthen the United Nations procedures. Thus, in January 1958 the United States renewed its proposal to restrict use of the veto in the Security Council. This offer was refused by the Soviet Union.

5. Our leadership has been manifested with particular vigor in recent crises which have brought threats to the peace before the United Nations.

6. When a Middle Eastern crisis arose in 1958, we promptly notified the United Nations of the action that we were taking in Lebanon to meet that crisis and called for an emergency session of the General Assembly to deal with the crisis. At that session, President Eisenhower proposed not only steps to counter the immediate threat in Lebanon and Jordan, but also long-range measures to improve basic conditions in the Middle East: An Arab Development Institution, a standby United Nations force, and possibly a United Nations study of Middle Eastern arms control. The countries concerned are making progress in laying the basis for an Arab Development Institution; the Secretary General has engaged in planning and consultation regarding a United Nations standby force.

7. We have strongly supported the General Assembly in the adoption of resolutions condemning offenses against mankind, such as the wholesale murder of the people of Tibet by the Chinese Communists and the brutal Soviet repression in Hungary.

8. We have welcomed to the community of nations the new countries of Africa. Our support of their admission to the United Nations is but a part of our dynamic policy of friendship and cooperation with these new nations as they attain independence.

As a result of United States action such as those indicated above, and of the Security Council action respecting Laos, the United Nations may become a more vital force in support of peace today than it was 7 years ago.

The tireless efforts of former Secretary of State Dulles not only made him a symbol of the fight by freedom against the Communist menace but also led to worldwide recognition of the success of the Republican administration's foreign policies. Secretary Herter has carried forward this great record at Geneva, Santiago, Ottawa, London, Paris, Bonn, and during the President's trip to Europe in September 1959.

The bipartisan nature of President Eisenhower's foreign policy is evidenced by the fact that Secretary Dulles continuously informed appropriate congressional bodies. During his 6 years as Secretary of State he took part in 213 such meetings. This close cooperation with the Congress is continuing under Secretary Herter.

In recent years, there has been a growing clarification of understanding around the world of the real purpose of the Communist leaders—to subject all the world to the dominant influence and control of international communism.

In the Middle East, the deadly designs of communism are now far more clearly realized than a few years ago.

Brutal Chinese Communist repression in Tibet and border incursions and demands against India have brought home aggressive Communist designs more clearly to the peoples of South Asia.

In Southeast Asia, liberty-loving peoples are struggling successfully to remain masters in their newly built national homes.

In Europe, there are a number of inspiring examples of national renewal and recession of Communist influence.

President Eisenhower's historic trip in December 1959 to 11 nations on the 3 continents of Asia, Africa, and Europe, and his trip to the Far East in June of this year, brought home to literally millions of persons the President's message of "peace and friendship in freedom" and the sharp contrast between this policy and the pressures and strings attached to relationships with the Soviets. The President also made important visits to South America, to Canada, and Mexico, as well as several visits to European capitals.

The leaders and peoples of nations of the free world now understand better than ever the sincerity of American policy favoring their independence and the willingness of America to support unconditionally their efforts to stay free and to do so in their own way, which may, indeed, be a non-Western way. As President Eisenhower said at the NATO meeting in December 1957, "There is a noble strategy of victory—not victory over any peoples, but victory for all peoples."

INTERDEPENDENCE

President Eisenhower's policies have been based on a belief that economic growth and interdependence are necessary conditions for stable and free nations.

Here are a number of things that the Republican administration has done in the last 7 years to promote that growth and interdependence:

1. It has given support to the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program. At President Eisenhower's request, the Congress in 1958 extended this program for a period of 4 years, the longest single extension during the 25-year history of the program.

The value of American foreign trade (excluding military exports) in 1953 was $23.2 billion, and in 1959 was $29.3 billion.

2. In 1957 the Congress, at the request of the Republican administration, established the U.S. Development Loan Fund with a capitalization of $300 million. This was a step to meet the needs of less-developed countries for loans on terms less rigorous than those offered from existing sources. In 1958 and 1959 the Congress appropriated $1.1 billion more for the Development Loan Fund. It was the first U.S. financial institution set up specifically to help less-developed countries. In its short life, the Fund has made a significant contribution to economic growth. Qualifying projects awaiting its review are far more numerous than the Fund can handle.

3. The United States has also moved vigorously to encourage the flow of private investment to less developed and other free nations. Under the Republican administration's investment guarantee program which provides insurance against noncommercial risks, such as inconvertibility of currency, expropriation, or war, nearly 40 nations have signed agreements and considerably over $200 million in insurance contracts have been issued.

The United States has negotiated and sought to negotiate treaties designed to create more favorable conditions for private investment abroad.

The Republican administration has commissioned two outstanding studies of means to encourage private investment and is currently considering measures to implement their recommendations.

We have encouraged and assisted the creation in foreign countries of development banks to make loans to private enterprise and of local productivity centers to render that enterprise more productive.

We encouraged the creation in 1956 of the International Finance Corporation, as an affiliate of the World Bank, to make investment in private enterprise abroad.

4. In August 1958 the President instructed the Secretary of the Treasury to propose to other members of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund that the resources of these institutions be enlarged so that they could continue their effective work in promoting economic growth and monetary stability. As a result, the Governors of both institutions recommended that member governments increase their subscriptions to the Fund and Bank by 50 percent and 100 percent respectively.

In February 1959 the President asked the Congress to authorize $3.175 billion and $1.375 billion increases in the U.S. subscriptions to the Bank and Fund. This has been done.

5. The President also authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to discuss with other governments the possible establishment of an International Development Association, as an affiliate of the World Bank. These discussions were fruitful, and we may expect to see this agency in operation in the near future, helping to mobilize free world resources to meet the less-developed countries' need for financing on flexible terms.

6. At the Republican administration's initiative, 18 European nations have joined Canada and the United States in preliminary steps to reconstitute the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. When the reconstituted OEEC is a reality, we should be able to collaborate more effectively in promoting sound economic growth in the free world and in mobilizing the resources of its industrialized members to help the newly developing lands.

7. The United States took the lead in proposing establishment of an institution to promote economic development in Latin America.

On April 9, 1959, the charter of a $1 billion Inter-American Bank was initiated in Washington. The ratification of this agreement by the United States and by all the other American States—except Cuba—has brought into being a sizable new source of funds for economic development loans to our good neighbors. The Bank's charter also provides for assisting in the development of managerial and technical skills, and the Bank will assist in social development projects where necessary.

8. In August 1958 the Republican administration offered the cooperation of the United States in the establishment of an Arab regional development financing program if the Middle Eastern States concerned were prepared to support such a venture. Exchanges of views among these states have taken place, and the initiative now lies with them.

9. A Common Market for Europe has long been officially supported by President Eisenhower, and in January 1959 the six-nation Common Market of Western Europe became a reality. Measures have also been taken to create an area of freer trade among seven other nations of Western Europe. In addition, Western European currencies have become more freely exchangeable and there is a strong movement for broader economic cooperation in Western Europe. The support of the United States played no small part in these accomplishments.

10. The United States has also moved to encourage and participate in the study of key raw material problems of particular concern to less developed countries. Through our good offices and on our initiative, the International Coffee Study Group was established in June 1958 to consider possible means of dealing with problems arising in international trade of coffee.

Through this study group the Mexico City Emergency Coffee Agreement was continued and expanded to consider the present imbalance in world coffee supply and demand. The United States at the ECOSOC meeting in July 1958 agreed also to become a member of the Commission on International Commodity Trade, which considers general problems relating to international trade in basic commodities.

11. On the initiative of the Republican administration an International Food for Peace Conference was held in May 1959 to discuss ways and means of utilizing wheat to relieve hunger and to promote economic development among the less developed countries of the free world.

It was participated in by the five major wheat exporting countries. It established a Food for Peace Wheat Utilization Committee to consider specific problems, such as how to make more effective use of wheat in improving living standards, in raising nutritional levels, and in strengthening the economies of free countries. This committee met in June.

At the conclusion of the meeting the other wheat exporting countries expressed their willingnesss to cooperate to the fullest possible extent in carrying out the objectives of the President's food-for-peace program.

12. Parallel with these new initiatives, the Republican administration has continued to support the mutual security program, which provides economic and military aid to free countries around the world.

13. The administration has moved energetically and successfully toward eliminating our unfavorable balance of trade with other nations. At our urging, more than a dozen nations have removed trade restrictions on American goods, and several others have indicated an intention to take similar action.

IN CONCLUSION

The Republican administration's foreign policy rests on two simple propositions: We want peace, liberty, and well-being for ourselves; and we cannot be sure of peace, liberty, and well-being unless other nations also have them.

VICE PRESIDENT NIXON STRESSES VITAL NEED FOR STUDY OF COMMUNISM

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it has long been my conviction, expressed on many occasions, that our failure to give the study of communism a place in our educational program represents a serious and regrettable national shortcoming. The classic admonition, "know thine enemy" was never more valid, never more urgent and timely, than it is in the face of the world struggle in which we are presently engaged with the ruthless forces of communism.

In the light of this compelling truth, I should like to cite a speech made recently at the University of San Francisco by Vice President NIXON. The subject of the Vice President's address was "Why We Should Study Communism," and its timeliness and significance are such that I ask unanimous consent that the text be inserted in the RECORD, together with the introductory remarks of Father Timothy J. McDonnell, of the University of San Francisco.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORTON in the chair). Is there objection?

The address and introductory remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY WE SHOULD STUDY COMMUNISM

(Remarks of Vice President RICHARD NIXON, at the University of San Francisco, in San Francisco, Calif., April 12, 1960)

Father Timothy J. McDonnell: "There was a time, as you all know, when the Vice President did not have very much to do; those days are gone forever. Since Mr. NIXON has become Vice President, he has added new dimensions to this office. The confidence of the President, the dangers to democracy, and the talent of the man who holds this office have made it the second greatest elected office in the whole world.

"Now, those of you who have taken our course in political science—'The Strategy and Tactics of Communism'—know that there was an investigation of communism which started back in the late thirties under the chairmanship of Mr. Dies and, later on, that committee was made a permanent Committee To Investigate Un-American Activities. A man who had great reputation was brought before that committee—his name was Alger Hiss—and he denied all the charges that were made against him.

"On August 6, 1948, it looked like a very dark day for all of those dedicated people who had worked for years in order to expose the Communist conspiracy. Those of you who have read Witness recall that Mr. Chambers said that but for the courage of a freshman Congressman on that particular day, all of the work that had gone before would have been doomed. But Mr. NIXON was not to be pushed aside by the reputation of people in high places. He was seeking the truth, and so he pushed on and brought that particular investigation to a successful completion.

"The next year, a version of the Mundt-Nixon bill, an attempt to curb the espionage activities of communism, was passed by the Congress. Mr. NIXON did not stay long in the House, as you all know; he moved over to the Senate and after a very brief career in the Senate he was chosen to be Vice President. And since that time he has become one of the best-known people in the whole world.

"And so, I need not introduce Mr. NIXON to you. You, and the people throughout the world, know him. You have seen his picture in magazines standing up to Mr. Khrushchev—defending our way of life. He is not a person that will take a backward step before any kind of force or odds; he cannot be threatened. And so, those of us who are interested in this particular fight in order to save our democratic way of life are extremely privileged and honored to have with us today the honorable Vice President of the United States of America, Mr. NIXON.

Vice President NIXON: "Father President, Father McDonnell, I want to tell you how very honored I am to be here at the University of San Francisco and to be greeted by such a large crowd. I certainly am most touched by the presentation of the credo of the University of San Francisco, which I previously had read. After reading it, I realized that I have apparently used it from time to time in speeches without knowing it. I was certainly most moved by the introduction given me. The only difficulty with that kind of an introduction is that you really cannot live up to all that has been said. In any event, to have this kind of an audience on a magnificent California spring day is one that would touch the heart of anybody in public life, and I appreciate your coming and giving me a chance to meet you and to talk with you about some of the issues of the day.

"To open the discussion today, it occurred to me that it might be well perhaps to use as a point of departure the remarks of Father McDonnell in his introduction. When I was coming to this university, I was talking to some of my advisers and they said: 'Well, there's no reason to talk about communism up here; this is an institution which, since 1951, has had a course in the strategy and tactics of world communism; this is an institution where there will be no question at all about how everybody feels about communism,' and so consequently this is a subject that perhaps should not be discussed for a variety of reasons. It is like carrying coals to Newcastle.

"Why should the young people of America, in our colleges and our universities, study communism, what it stands for, its tactics, and its strategey? Why is it necessary that in a great institution like this, where there is not any question about what people believe in their hearts with regard to loyalty, where there is not any question about their natural antipathy to this alien, atheistic idea * * * why is it necessary to spend hours and hours hearing lectures and writing examination papers on a subject like that?

"I think it is necessary; I think it is constructive. I wish that in every college and university in this country there was a required course, so that people who were going to be doctors, lawyers, and nurses, and businessmen—all of the professions not directly related to politics—had to know what the world struggle is all about. Because it is not enough to have the right feeling, the right emotions, about your country and your system and the right feelings and emotions against an alien system. We are confronted with a force represented by men and women in the world today who are not satisfied with feeling in their hearts as they do that their cause is right and that it will prevail; they realize they must be as well versed in what their actual opponents stand for as in what they stand for. All over the world in varying degrees they are represented by people who, however much we may disagree with them, have done their homework, who know what they believe, who have very good ideas as to what we believe or what they think we believe, and who are able generally to come up against well-intentioned representatives, whether they be in government or business or military, of free countries and generally win an argument in the great court of public opinion.

"Why? Because their case is superior? No—because they are better prepared, because they have more stamina, because they have made sure in their preparation that they know the answers to the questions that will be raised by their potential opponents, and they also know the questions that they may want to put to their potential opponents.

"Many of you have probably read, or at least heard about—'The Ugly American.' As you may recall from reading that book, or hearing about it, the 'ugly' American described some people in Government, in the military, and in private business abroad. The authors of the book did not feel generally that these people were putting the best face this country had to present before the people of the countries to which they were accredited. There was the reaction you might expect. There were many people in Government in Washington, D.C., who felt that this is all untrue and unfair.

"Now let me say it is untrue, if you were to say that the characters delineated in 'The Ugly American' were general in their application. But I can also tell you this: I have been to many countries abroad. I have seen a great number of dedicated foreign servants abroad, who were not described in 'The Ugly American' and who were doing a splendid job—and the great majority, we may be thankful, are doing a good job in representing America.

"But I have also seen every one of the characters depicted in that book. What I am really trying to say here is that in these days it is essential that the people who represent America abroad, whether they are in Government or in private business, have to be the very best that we can send. It is essential that the people who develop the policies for America at home be the very best that America can produce. And they cannot be the best in producing those policies unless they are thoroughly indoctrinated, thoroughly oriented in what we believe and what our potential opponents believe, in the difference, and how we fight this struggle not just to keep from losing it, but to win it.

"Looking at 'The Ugly American,' may I say that, again, many people on the critical side who agreed with the book said it was apparent that the people were deficient from a number of points; they did not know the language of the country to which they were accredited (and this was true of some of them); some of them did not have enough study about the cultures and traditions of the countries to which they were accredited. As a result many people jumped to the conclusion that the way to make sure that all Government personnel abroad are the quality that we should have is to see that we have required study of languages so that nobody is sent abroad who does not know the language; and second, that we have a requirement that they be thoroughly indoctrinated in the cultures and the traditions of the countries to which they are accredited, so that they will not do anything that might react unfavorably as far as the sensitivities of the people of those countries to which they are accredited.

"Both of these things are important—they are absolutely essential. But we could make no greater mistake than to assume that it is enough to send abroad a person who knows the language, who knows the cultures, and who knows the conditions. We have to have another ingredient, and that is people who know the world struggle, who know the tactics and strategy of world communism, and who not only have an emotional love of country or patriotism which, of course, translated means 'love of country,' but who also know why we love our country, and what it stands for.

"That, of course, to me is the great challenge of American education today. So that we can meet the people on the other side—with people who not only represent a better case than they do but people who can present that case as it ought to be presented, vigorously, with feeling, and also with intelligence and knowledge. People who have done their homework as well as the other fellow, people who have even more stamina than the other fellow. It is going to take an effort just as great as that, just as intensive as that, if America and the cause of freedom are to survive.

"People have often asked me—what impressed me the most about Mr. Khrushchev and Mr. Mikoyan and the other Communist leaders that I met? I have been impressed—in Mr. Khrushchev's case—by a very incisive sense of humor, a quickness in surveying a situation and in always being on the offensive whenever he felt it might serve his purposes. I have been impressed, too, by his great stamina but I would say that above all, what impresses you about the Communist leaders around the world is that again, whether you agree with them or not, they are true believers that their cause is right. They have faith that they are representing the force of destiny and that they will eventually prevail. We cannot beat true believers with people who believe in the wrong thing, or even worse, with people who believe in nothing or do not know what they believe.

"That is why you should remember in going over the strategy and tactics of world communism, that the purpose is not to convince you why you should be against communism, there is no need of that—that the purpose is not a course in American Government to convince you of why you ought to be for American ideals, for preserving them, for helping this country to live up to them. The purpose is to sharpen your minds, and develop your abilities, so that as you go out in this country and as you go out through the world you will be able to be intelligent, articulate advocates of our cause as against those who would destroy us and everything that we stand for.

"And so for these and other reasons, may I say that I am very honored to be here today, before this audience, in an institution which recognizes this problem, which is doing so well in indoctrinating its students in these vitally important subjects."

THE DUKES OF DIXIELAND

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, the State of Louisiana, which I am proud to represent, is the home of many wonderful products—cane sugar, on which we have spent considerable attention today, rice—Louisiana grows more than all of China—strawberries, sulfur, oil and gas, beautiful Creole queens, and the list goes on and on. Not the least of our products is the only truly American folk music, native to these shores.

I am referring of course to Dixieland jazz, which spread from New Orleans' Basin Street to the farthest reaches of our globe—and I understand that our first astronaut will be a hot trumpet man. That same Dixieland jazz came to Capitol Hill this past Thursday, when the Dukes of Dixieland "jammed" to an enthusiastic and overflowing audience in the rotunda of the Old Senate Office Building.

The Dukes of Dixieland, led by the young brothers Frank and Freddie Assunto, and featuring their father, affectionately known as "Papa Jac," all solid natives of "the land of dreams, way down yonder in New Orleans," are among the foremost exponents of this truly American art form, Dixieland jazz. The junior Senator from Louisiana sincerely hopes that everyone who did not have the opportunity to hear the Dukes last Thursday will someday have the chance to visit New Orleans and Bourbon Street (which has replaced Basin Street as the mecca of Dixieland) and hear the Dukes and others of our native sons blowing out Dixieland jazz.

THOUGHT-PROVOKING IDEAS OF GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER FOR REFORM OF OUR GOVERNMENTAL MACHINERY

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it was my pleasure yesterday morning to hear the Governor of my State, Nelson A. Rockefeller, present a series of challenging and thought-provoking suggestions for changes in the Fedral Government machinery to meet the needs of our changing times. Based on his long experience in the executive branch, his activities as chief administrative officer of the Nation's largest State, and on his own intensive studies of America's world position and governmental reform, the Governor's proposals deserve serious consideration.

Mr. President, it must be obvious to all who have given study to this problem that every possible avenue—no matter how sweeping reforms are found to be needed—must be explored to insure that our governmental machinery is responsive to the swift-moving demands of the day. As Governor Rockefeller emphasized, we must be imaginative, and we must be creative in coming to grips with the challenges which lie ahead. In the massive study which is necessary to assure America's world preeminence by reform of our governmental structure Governor Rockefeller's contributions will be of invaluable assistance. I ask unanimous consent that the text of his statement before the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY GOV. NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER FOR PRESENTATION TO SUBCOMMITTEE ON NATIONAL POLICY MACHINERY OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

I deeply appreciate this opportunity to appear before the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery of the Senate Committee on Government Operations.

This subcommittee is performing an outstanding service to the Nation. The Nation's problems, the world's problems, press upon the policymakers in Washington with ever-increasing urgency and in ever-growing complexity.

In seeking solutions to these problems, there can be no substitute for able men in Government—men of vision, of capacity, of courage. But not even the best of men can perform to the fullness of their abilities, nor will men of ability be attracted to Government or encouraged to stay in Government, if inadequate organization frustrates accomplishment. Thus, in its extensive exploration into the question of improving the organization of Government, this subcommittee is addressing itself—importantly, constructively, and with nonpartisan objectivity—to a fundamental need of this Government in dealing with a world of danger, of opportunity, and of fantastically rapid change. That need is to provide a framework within which able men can perform the great deeds demanded by the challenges of our times.

I know from personal experience that no man is more deeply concerned with this question than President Eisenhower. During the 6 years of my chairmanship of the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization, 14 reorganization plans presented by the President were adopted by the Congress. The President's vision, breadth of concept and creativity made possible the substantial advances in Government organization achieved in recent years. In addition, they have profoundly influenced the thought behind specific proposals I shall make to this subcommittee today, although, naturally, I alone assume responsibility in recommending these proposals for your consideration.

With recommendations from the President, the Congress at its next session should, as a first order of business, set about adapting the Government's machinery to the needs, the urgencies, the demands for decisive action that the times require. I am confident that the work of this subcommittee will be of great value in accomplishing this.

As a fundamental step to be taken either at this Congress or at the next, I recommend the extension of the Reorganization Act of 1949, which expired last year. This legislation provided the basis for the reorganization plans adopted in the last decade, and should be renewed.

Governmental reorganization is necessarily a matter of cooperation between the legislative and executive branches. Understandably, it is a matter in which many toes will get stepped on, many vested interests within the Government feel imperiled. The blunt truth is that—despite all past progress—the present structure of the Federal Government is still not geared to support the President in developing and executing integrated policy, thoughtfully and purposefully, either in the complex areas of national security and foreign policy, or in the equally complex area of domestic affairs.

Few realize the tremendous load the President carries in his multiple responsibilities as Chief of State, Chief Executive, Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, the man constitutionally responsible for the conduct of our foreign policy, and leader of his political party. More than 50 departments and agencies of the Government report directly to the President. Their number imposes upon him an almost impossible burden—in the need to resolve conflicting approaches and divergent advice, and, from such sources, select and set a determined course of action.

In an effort to bring order to this array of agencies, a host of interdepartmental and interagency committees has been set up. These have come to number approximately 160 in the field of international affairs alone. In fact, international affairs involve, one way or another, the activity and responsibility of every department of our Government. There are also some 18 independent agencies, as well as sundry boards and commissions, involved in aspects of international affairs. The field of foreign economic aid alone involves as many as four Government agencies—and six international financial organizations.

This overelaborate pattern of interdepartmental committees has been designed over the years in an earnest effort to meet the legion of complex problems in both foreign and domestic affairs. The simple fact is this: the committees of a democratic government cannot hope to meet or to master these problems by simply trying to outnumber them. The critical need is for a revamped structure of government.

The fact, today, is that the structure of our Government too often moves slowly, even sluggishly, to meet this world of swift-moving change. It tends to be stiff and static—when it should be quick, alert, and creative. There is, therefore, a growing public awareness and concern about the structure of Government and the efficiency of its decision-making process. And one great proof of this public concern and interest is the existence—and the work—of this committee.

With all this in mind, I deeply believe that the time has come when we can look forward to achieving important reforms at the next session of the Congress.

I have no illusions about the complexity of these tasks. In the light of my own experience in Federal Government, and having undertaken, as Governor of New York, that State government's first reorganization in 30 years, I am well aware of the toughness of the problems. Yet I believe very strongly that both the clear need of the Nation and the quickened concern of the people make this a necessary, and a realistic, time for action.

Let us proceed, then, to the major specific areas of action—both foreign and domestic. For in both these areas the structure of Government demands reorganization to assist the President in wisely formulating and effectively executing national policy. As early as 1955, former President Herbert Hoover recognized this sweeping need by suggesting the creation of two appointed Vice Presidents with specific responsibilities respectively for foreign and domestic affairs. This problem was given active and detailed study by the President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization—while I was chairman of that committee.

I welcome this opportunity to make the following recommendations in these two important fields:

1. Foreign Affairs and National Security:

(a) Creation of the post of First Secretary of Government to assist the President in the exercise of his authority in this whole area.

(b) Further reorganization of the Defense Department to achieve unified doctrine, planning, and command.

2. Domestic Affairs:

(a) Creation of the post of Executive Assistant to the President, to be head of a newly created Office of Executive Management.

(b) Consolidation, in certain areas, at the departmental and agency level, of functions now scattered among various Government agencies, particularly in such important fields as transportation and water resources.

I. FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Let us examine briefly how further—and more forceful—support may be given to the President in his constitutional responsibility for the formulation, coordination, and conduct of foreign policy.

The problem

The problem is too complex to be soluble by simply adding more authority or more power or more functions to the Department of State, foreign operations involve the Department of Defense and other major departments and agencies—each with its own special concern, and attitude toward, international problems.

The crux of the problem is to help develop a coordinated Presidential policy and program which can then be administered, on a day-to-day basis, by the existing agencies of Government. The proliferation of agencies and committees in this whole field has tended to increase and complicate—rather than ease and clarify—the burden upon the President in defining and directing policy. The reason is obvious. The more numerous and varied the sources of divergent advice and advocacy—from departments, agencies, committees and individuals—the less chance or time has been left to the President for reflective, overall, long-range defining of purpose, and planning of policy.

The proper role of the committee, in our Government, is a subtle and delicate one. The system of committees, of course, works well in the Congress: it is basic to the legislative process, providing mechanism for concession and consensus as well as means for mustering votes for final legislative decision. And committees also have a proper and important place in the executive branch—either by sharing counsel among those empowered to act, or by conducting ad hoc studies on specific problems.

But execessive government by committee can be anything but constructive. In the field of executive action, it can reduce the level of Government action to the least bold or imaginative—to the lowest common denominator among many varying positions. In such circumstances, policy may be determined not for the sake of its rightness—but for the sake of agreement. And then the bold and imaginative action most needed, in these critical times, becomes least probable or possible.

The essential objectives are three.

First. In support and furtherance of our national purpose, we must integrate fully, at the Presidential level, the international political, diplomatic, economic and social, military, informational, cultural and psychological aspects of foreign affairs.

Second. We also must relate and integrate these matters—from the perspective of the responsibility of the Presidency—with all of our compelling domestic concerns—economic or social, financial or regulatory—as all these affect our national conduct in the world.

Third. We must provide the governmental structure that can effectively assist the President in developing objectives and policies, in all the area of foreign policy and national security, so clear and so thoughtful that they will give unified and purposeful direction to America's unique role in serving—and enhancing—the future of freedom.

The recommendations

To achieve these objectives—vital equally to our national security and our world role—I recommend two broad courses of action.

1. I recommend creation of the post of First Secretary of the Government to assist the President in exercise of his constitutional responsibility and authority in all the area of national security and international affairs.

This means—in more explicit detail—the following:

(a) The First Secretary should be appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

(b) He should have statutory designation as Executive Chairman of the National Security Council.

(c) He should exercise authority as delegated to him by the President, and subject to withdrawal of such authority by, and at the will of, the President.

(d) He should be empowered, at the discretion of the President, to act for the President in international matters at the prime ministerial level, with the Secretary of State operating on the level of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs.

(e) He should have a staff of his own and be empowered to use and reorganize all of the interdepartmental planning machinery of the Government in the area of national security and foreign affairs.

While the First Secretary, deriving his authority from the President and acting on his behalf, would have a status above that of the Cabinet, the operating responsibilities of Cabinet officers would not be changed. Thus, the Secretary of State would continue to be in charge of the day-to-day conduct of diplomacy. So, too, the Secretary of Defense would continue to be in the direct line of Presidential command of the Armed Forces.

As Executive Chairman of the National Security Council, the First Secretary could be delegated the authority, by Executive order or by legislation, to appoint the chairmen of such supporting groups as the Operations Coordinating Board, the Council on Foreign Economic Policy, and the National Advisory Council on international monetary and financial problems.

2. I recommend the reorganization of defense planning and command to achieve, under the President, unified doctrine and unified direction of forces.

More specifically, this means the following:

(a) The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff should be designated principal military Adviser to the Secretary of Defense and the President, and be responsible for development of overall strategic doctrine.

(b) The Staff of the Joint Chiefs should be organized on a unified basis under direct authority of the Chairman.

(c) All officers above the rank of brigadier general or the equivalent should be designated officers of the Armed Forces of the United States—not the individual service of their earlier careers—and their promotion should be placed in the control of the Department of Defense.

(d) Full authority should be given to the Secretary of Defense over all military research, development and procurement, so that he may assure the most productive utilization of research and development funds.

(e) The budget process of the Defense Department should be revised so that Congress appropriates all funds to the Secretary, thereby fixing in him a focus of fiscal responsibility similar to that held by other departments.

II. DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

The urgencies are as clear and great in the area of domestic affairs as in the areas of foreign affairs and national security. Here, too, the President needs the service and support of a structure of government more effectively assisting him to define national purpose and executive national policy, in meeting the swiftness and the complexity of the problems and challenges of our time.

The problems

Such is the nature of this period of history that the problems confronting the Government have seemed to multiply even faster than the agencies created to cope with them.

To be specific:

There is the sheer number of departments and agencies reporting to the President—in essentially domestic affairs, no less than 8 departments and some 40 agencies.

There is the ever-widening scope of problems confronted within the Executive Office of the President itself. This office includes such diverse duties as those of the Bureau of the Budget, the President's Assistant for Personnel Management, other specialized officials within the White House Office, the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, and the Council of Economic Advisors.

There is the constant and ever more difficult task of resolving conflicts between program objectives and budgetary limitations.

There is the ever-increasing volume of legislation pending in the Congress each year, including legislation proposed by the President—all reflecting new problems, freshly and forcefully challenging all departments of Government.

And there is the need for thoughtful long-range planning and development of policy—made ever more difficult, and ever more necessary, by problems ever more complex.

The objective

The President alone simply cannot undertake to meet the volume of problems and functions today demanding his attention, study, and action. To ignore this fact would be to strain the structure of our Government at its very apex—to allow it to be weak where it must be most strong.

The essential objective, then, is to give to the President a strong supporting structure within his own office for policy formulation and concrete decision.

A second objective is to assure that, at the level of the departments and agencies themselves, there is an organizational structure adapted to meeting the key domestic problems of today.

The recommendations

1. I recommend the creation of the post of Executive Assistant to the President and Director of the Office of Executive Management, to assist in planning and management in the sphere of domestic affairs.

There should be created immediately under the President a new Office of Executive Management. Five key functions should be transferred to the new Office of Executive Management, to be carried out by five bureaus created within the new office. Each bureau should be under the direction of a noncareer official appointed by the President. The director of the new office would report directly to the President.

Under the plan I propose, these five bureaus and their functions would be:

(a) Bureau of the Budget functions: Budget formulation and administration.

(b) Bureau of Legislative Clearance and Coordination functions: The review, clearance, coordination and development of legislation proposed by the executive branch, and of the administration's position with respect to other legislation pending in Congress.

(c) Bureau of Program and Planning functions: Development and coordination of recommendations concerning executive branch programs, including participation in long-range studies and planning.

(d) Bureau of Organization and Management functions: Coordination and improvement of the organization and management functions of the executive branch, including accounting and statistical programs.

(e) Bureau of Personnel Management functions: Assistance to the President in exercising his leadership in personnel management throughout the executive branch.

The Office of Executive Management, if created along these lines, would serve the President more effectively than the present structures of Government in the general management of administrative matters, including budgetary, personnel, planning and organizational activities. The office would assume the functions of various units within the Executive Office of the President and would, over a period of time, remove the need for numerous temporary staff arrangements established to meet special problems.

Even with an ideal organizational structure at the White House level, the President's responsibilities with respect to domestic affairs cannot, any more than in the field of national defense, be effectively performed without sound organization at the departmental and agency level. All too often the location of a particular function within a department or agency is more a matter of history than of logic. Thus, in a number of areas improved governmental machinery is essential to sound policy development in meeting the critical and emerging problems of today and tomorrow.

In these areas:

2. I recommend the consolidation of functions which are now scattered among various Government departments and agencies, particularly in such important fields as transportation and water resources.

The field of transportation is a good example because of its critical importance to the growth of our economy in time of peace and to the defense of our Nation in time of war. In spite of general recognition of the importance of transportation, we still do not have today a single focal point within the Federal Government for the formulation of overall national transportation policy, accompanied by broad powers to develop such policy and coordinate the activities of other agencies.

To remedy this, I recommend the creation of a new Department of Transportation, to which would be transferred all governmental transportation functions now located both inside and outside the Commerce Department. These transferred functions would include all the responsibilities of the Federal Aviation Agency, as well as the present promotional and administrative functions of the regulatory agencies: the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Federal Maritime Board.

Another example—equally clear—is the area of water resources policy, where a dispersion of responsibilities has made the development of a coordinated and coherent Government policy very difficult.

III. CONCLUSION

I have outlined—briefly—a program of some specific measures to assist the President and the executive branch of the Federal Government in meeting the clear responsibilities and compelling challenges before it.

I believe such measures will enable the executive branch, in all areas of national policy, to give direction more firm and unified, and decision more swift and thoughtful.

No citizens are more keenly aware than you, gentlemen, of what is ultimately at stake here. The matters discussed seem technical or mechanical. They rise, in ultimate meaning, far above this level. They are tests—practical tests—of whether free government can work, and can work well. They are tests that come at a time when the processes of freedom—the workings of democracy—stand under fire and under challenge in the world at large. They are tests that we, as a people and as a nation, can and must meet.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AS AN ISSUE

Mr. HART. Mr. President, as we engage in activities in the Congress prior to leaving for our respective party conventions, I believe it is well to ask unanimous consent that an editorial entitled "National Defense as an Issue," which was published June 27, 1960, in a McGraw-Hill publication, Aviation Week, be printed as a part of the RECORD. I believe it suggests something we should consider in the development of our platforms and our debates this fall, and is well worth our attention.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL DEFENSE AS AN ISSUE

As both Republican and Democratic Parties head toward their convention halls to nominate candidates for the fall presidential election, it is evident that the issue of national defense will loom larger than any of the professional politicians anticipated. It may be that national defense will become the paramount issue in the contest to choose a President to direct the destiny of this country for the next 4 years.

If this occurs it will not represent any revolutionary change in human nature, for survival has always been a more basic human concern than the size of a tax bill or bank account. What has changed in the past 6 months has been the American people's perception that survival is indeed at stake and that the threat from the Sino-Russian Communist bloc is fact, not a fiction of campaign oratory.

This perception has been slowly accumulating during the 2½ years since the orbiting of Sputnik I provided dramatic confirmation of the startling Soviet technical progress that had been reported consistently by a few sources, including Aviation Week, since 1954. The impact of both this Soviet technical progress and the reporting of it by Western sources was deadened by two factors:

First, the steadfast denial by top level U.S. Government officials that this technical progress was occurring, and later when this position became untenable, pursuit of a consistent public policy of deprecating the effects of this Soviet progress on our own position of international leadership.

Second, the difficulty of authenticating the facts on Soviet technical progress in the early phases of this era when the Soviets were still trying to keep their developments under security wraps.

Since October 1957, when Sputnik I went into orbit, the Soviets have lost no opportunity to publicly demonstrate their technical progress in the key technologies on which modern power is based. The series of space shots, the 7,600 mile ICBM shots into the Pacific and their concerted attempt to gain all of the major world records for aircraft have provided some international authentication of their claims.

But even more dramatic have been the tragic events of the Paris summit conference and the withdrawal of invitations for President Eisenhower to visit the Soviet Union and Japan. This has brought home to the American people more than anything else that there has been a deterioration of our military power on the international scale, or at least that a general impression to this effect has encouraged our opponents to action they would not dare if the margin of our military superiority and our determination to use it when necessary were not open to debate.

So we come to the summer of 1960, when one of the major considerations of both parties must be how their candidates will be measured on this primary issue of national survival. Beyond looms the election campaign, when the American people are certain to apply this yardstick of a candidate's understanding and capability on the national defense problem as a critical measurement of his ability to lead this Nation.

A new President will find the critical problems of national defense will not even wait for the triumph of inaugural day. They will be with him from the morning after the election returns are tallied, and there are many grave decisions that he will have to begin considering long before he officially takes office.

Here are some of the early decisions a new President will have to make on national defense:

Is the defense budget adequate either in fiscal resources or in the direction in which these resources are being oriented? The organization of the fiscal 1962 defense budget will already be well under way by the time a new President takes office, and he will have to inject his defense philosophy into its preparation immediately after the election if it is to become effective.

Can the portion of the national resources devoted to defense be effectively utilized under the present organization of the Defense Department, or is a further managerial revolution required to get maximum effective military power out of the resources applied?

Can we have any assurance at all of maintaining an effective deterrent force during the next 4 years without immediate decisions to prepare for an adequate airborne alert for Strategic Air Command's B-52 heavy bomber fleet? Will the failure to put at least 25 percent of this heavy bomber force on airborne alert, coupled with a major increase in Soviet air defense capability, produce a shift in the deterrent equation that might tempt the aggressive use of a major ICBM force?

Can we handle fringe wars and aggressive military probings without a ground force equipped with modern weapons and capable of maximum air transportability at jet speeds?

Are we putting the effort required into antisubmarine warfare?

Are we pushing with all the capability of our national resources along a broad research spectrum to insure that the major technical breakthroughs on new weapons are made under our aegis, rather than by a potential aggressor?

These are only a few of the defense problems a new President must face. All of them have been made more acute by the failure to face them fully and determinedly during the past 3 years, even after the nature and strength of the Communist threat had been clearly shown.

There is little doubt that the next 4 years will be one of the most perilous periods in our national history in the face of the military, economic and intellectual challenge of communism.

The candidates, the delegates concerned with their nomination, and the voters who will make the final decision should use this yardstick of national defense as a key measurement of their choice for a national leader for the next 4 years. We have every confidence that they will.

INFLUENCE

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, the word "influence" occurs only once in the whole Bible, and that is in a sublime passage from the book of Job in which the Almighty asks Job unanswerable questions. Among the questions is this one: "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" The Pleiades are a cluster of stars in Taurus, one of the constellations of the heavens. We of today know a good deal about refrigerators and radios and automobiles, but the ancients knew more about the stars; and I am not sure that their knowledge is not to be preferred. Little is known about the Pleiades; but the intimation here is that they exert an influence—perhaps on other celestial bodies, perhaps upon our world, its life, and its climate. Whatever that influence is, it was thought of by this inspired author as benign, powerful, silent, irresistible. "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" A beautiful idea this is, and not only does a heavenly body influence other spheres, but an individual's life will influence the lives of others. The power and influence of one life upon another can never be measured.

Mr. President, one of the greatest of influences in the molding of men's characters and the shaping of men's lives is that of the teacher. I have spoken of this before, but that which motivates me to refer again to it today is the beautiful expression of thought embodied in "My Teacher," some verses written by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. I came across Senator WILEY's words concerning a favorite teacher of a bygone day, and I believe them to be so true and worthy of contemplation that I decided then to insert them in the RECORD.

The ingratiating personality, charming manner, ready smile, and upward look of the man who is now a distinguished Senator from a great State, must have received their genesis in the inspiration he received from the teacher whom he remembered after she had left the toils of earth. Could his teacher know him as we know the delightful Senator now, she would be proud, and justly so. The influence which was like the dawn has somehow guided him like the stars.

MY TEACHER

She was no purveyor of mere facts.
With her, grades were not the thing.
She had enthusiasm—the Greeks' "fire of the soul,"
And she gave of it, and giving,
Her students caught the flame.
Building men was her task.
She told us to "dream dreams,
Build ourselves a great plan of life,
Full of joy and vision."
With her nothing was dull and monotonous.
Every bit of learning was a step to nobler truth.

"Life was a mysterious adventure.
We were growing units of a perfect entity.
We were singers of a great symphony.
We were seekers for more light."
Glad and joyous was she,
And she taught us to be likewise
"No task was drudgery, but an opportunity for growth."

"In helping others, we helped ourselves.
We were like Millet,
Painting pictures for eternity."
We were called to do great things.
She fed us self-reliance and the dignity of life;
She taught us to think, to breathe, to feel;
To get rid of fear and ignorance,
And dare to go out and do.

Radiant was this woman.
Like sunshine was her presence,
And her influence was like the dawn.

—ALEXANDER WILEY, U.S. Senator, Wisconsin.

PAUL DOUGLAS: A LEADER FOR THE HAZARDS OF THE FUTURE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, on Monday of this week, the eminent historian, Allan Nevins, gave an address in Chicago, entitled "PAUL DOUGLAS: A Leader for the Hazards of the Future."

This speech is such a merited evaluation of the senior Senator from Illinois that I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAUL DOUGLAS: A LEADER FOR THE HAZARDS OF THE FUTURE

(Address by Allan Nevins, Chicago, Ill., June 27, 1960)

Ten days ago I sat high above Park Avenue, New York, in the study of the recently retired Nestor of the Senate, one of the wisest leaders of our time, a lifelong champion of Democratic principles: Herbert H. Lehman. With glowing enthusiasm he commented on the man whom we meet tonight to honor.

"By long odds the most useful and inspiring Senator of my time," said Mr. Lehman, "was PAUL H. DOUGLAS, of Illinois." I interrupted to say that Mr. Lehman himself had some title to that distinction. "No," he repeated, "the ablest Senators all agreed, the best informed newspaper correspondents all agreed, that the strongest man in the Chamber has been Mr. DOUGLAS." He smiled a little ruefully, "PAUL DOUGLAS, like myself," he added, "sometimes lost a valuable measure by his refusal to compromise on principle. But we liked to think that such defeats were as creditable as our victories." And Mr. Lehman went on to speak of his warm personal affection for Senator DOUGLAS.

We can say that PAUL DOUGLAS' whole career down to 1948 was a preparation for his succeeding years of preeminent usefulness in the Senate. We have seen men rise to high station in this country by adroitly seizing political chances, by currying favor with powerful interests, and by traducing their opponents; we can all think of examples. By contrast, how laborious, how self-sacrificing, how devoted to the highest aims was PAUL DOUGLAS' apprenticeship for public duty. He began with hard labor on a New England farm; he worked his way through Bowdoin College, a seat of plain living and high thinking; determined to gain the best possible equipment, he struggled on to a doctorate in economics in Columbia University—and a very distinguished doctorate. He put hard toil into books which won international renown; he gained a chair at the University of Chicago.

Never once did he take the easy or expedient path. Busy writing and teaching in this city in the sluggish years of Coolidge and Hoover, he perceived social injustices which stirred his anger; and he was soon leading a memorable battle against the greedy activities of Samuel Insull and his holding company—a battle which culminated in the passage of the Illinois Utilities Act of 1933. He served as an expert consultant on unemployment to Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York. In the years of the New Deal, he was one of the practical experts who caught the spirit of that movement and made it a continental force, effective in the States as in the Nation. He gave energy to the Housing Commission of Illinois; he formulated the old-age pension act of the State in 1935, and 2 years later the unemployment insurance act. He was one of the leaders who changed what Theodore Roosevelt called the Americanism of social irresponsibility and indiscriminate individualism into the Americanism of responsibility, discipline, and cooperative union. In his public labors in Illinois he never sought the limelight or asked to play a stellar role. It was part of his deep integrity that he was content to play a useful part with quiet efficiency, disdaining self-advertisement or material reward.

And when the Second World War began, he went far beyond the call of duty in his search for a post of peril in the humblest rank. He might have found a dozen excuses for remaining at home: in his 50 years, in his five children, in his duties as professor, alderman of the fifth ward in Chicago, and expert consultant on public problems. He might have asked a commission and a post in Washington. But with his unswerving instinct for the laborious and self-sacrificing course, he enlisted as a private, and took his place with other marines in the front lines. He was as ready to give up his life as had been that other Illinoisan raised to the Senate, E. D. Baker, who was slain at Ball's Bluff. Like his other achievements, he has modestly cloaked his heroism as a fighter. But he rose from the ranks to be major; he was awarded the Bronze Star for gallantry in action; he was twice wounded, at Peleliu and at Okinawa, and spent 14 months in hospitals; and his comrades in arms have termed him the very model of a resourceful officer.

All liberal Americans rejoiced when in 1948, after a campaign in which he distinguished himself by his direct appeal to the voters, PAUL DOUGLAS won a seat in the Senate by a plurality of 407,000 votes. He was needed there. Franklin D. Roosevelt was 3 years in his grave; by a totally unexpected victory, Harry Truman clutched the Presidency from the very grasp of conservative Republicans. The American people needed DOUGLAS' voice.

In nearly a century and a half in the Union, Illinois has given the country a beadroll of Senators equaled by few States and surpassed by none. The list is headed by two illustrious names. One was Stephen A. Douglas, the greatest party leader of his day, who played a central part in framing the compromise of 1850, who courageously strove to allay the fever of sectional passion by the principle of popular sovereignty, and who had a clear vision of the coming commercial greatness of the Northwest. The other was Lyman Trumbull, the ablest defender of civil rights in his time, and author of the 13th amendment abolishing slavery throughout the land. Sturdy fighters in both war and peace adorn the roster. We should not forget John A. Logan, who was termed by Rutherford B. Hayes the most eminent of all the volunteer soldiers of the Civil War; or Richard Oglesby, hero of two conflicts, thrice Governor, and friend of the common man; or John M. Palmer, who after a distinguished military and political career left the Republican Party in disgust with its corruption, became the foremost advocate of the popular election of Senators, and was nominated for President in 1896 by the Cleveland Democrats. History will always have a place on its page for Shelby M. Cullom, whose labors in bringing the railroads under Government control are commemorated by the Cullom Act establishing the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Yet for reasons which every Illinoisan should understand, no name on this list shines more brightly than that of PAUL H. DOUGLAS. Of all our Senators, none has written a more consistently elevated record of public service; none has so clearly combined intellectual distinction—technical expertness—with practical legislative power; none has set so high a moral example. Why is it that this is less fully understood in Illinois than in Washington? It is because only close observers of the governmental scene can appraise the immense contribution which the personal gifts of Mr. DOUGLAS—his rugged forthright honesty, his passion for thorough information and careful planning, his unflagging industry, his broad human sympathies—have made to public life. It is also because he has been too busy and too modest to call attention to his record. During the war, Winston Churchill said of Field Marshal Alexander: "He is no glory-hopper." The Senator is no glory-hopper.

We tend too much to judge our public servants by the list of measures for which they can "claim credit." By this criterion PAUL DOUGLAS would take as high a position as any national legislator since the one whom he in many ways resembles—George W. Norris, of Nebraska. He introduced the bill which increased the minimum wage from 75 cents an hour to $1. He conducted the investigation which exposed the misuse of pension and welfare funds, and wrote the legislation which protected them. He led the struggle 2 years ago for an effective 4-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act. Only last year he introduced and pushed to passage the congressional resolution for a Captive Nations Week to encourage the peoples imprisoned behind the Iron Curtain. He secured the legislation for important improvements in railroad retirement benefits. But this is not the essence of his services as Senator.

Even if he had not carried a single memorable measure in Congress—even if he had not written the first great slum clearance and urban redevelopment program in this country, even if he had not led in putting our first important civil rights legislation on the statute books, even had he not written other liberal enactments—PAUL DOUGLAS would still be one of the impressive figures of our era. He has earned that position by bringing into the stale atmosphere of public life the freshening quality it most needs; the quality of a lofty moral rigor, of an instructed conscience. He is one of the few men in public life of whom it can be said that he stands on a pinnacle where the air is pure and bracing, where the clamor of selfish men is muted, and where events and forces fall into their true perspective. * * *

He has sometimes been on the unpopular side; he has sometimes been on the losing side; but he has always been on the just side. His reputation for so-called radicalism can be traced partly to his insistence on striking at the root of any problem, partly to that refusal to compromise which Herbert Lehman commended. For he believes with John Morley, who said: "It makes all the difference in the world whether we put truth in the first place, or in the second." This austere rectitude inspired Senator DOUGLAS' pursuit of such scandals as those in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It inspired his work in drafting the first code of ethics for government, which helped awaken the public to the evils of influence peddling, and has shaped legislation in New York and Ohio.

With this ethical elevation Senator DOUGLAS couples another quality of equal importance, his compassion for all struggling people. He knows that life is hard; he knows that the unfortunate need Government protection. It is because he has a stern inner compulsion to help plain people to a safer, richer life that he has fought so incessantly for slum clearance and city redevelopment. This is the reason he has battled so hard for Federal assistance to give the people better schools, for fairer tax laws, and for a liberalization of our immigration policies. And this, basically, explains why he has so relentlessly opposed pork-barrel measures for public works, and the preventable waste which sullies our defense effort. He knows that most of the money thrown away in Government waste comes out of the pockets of the common people. Only a fortnight ago he declared that a scientific revision of the procurement methods of the Defense Department could save $2 or $3 billion a year; and he had on his desk not only facts and figures to prove his statement, but examples of tools of war which our Government had bought at 2 or 5 or 10 times their true value. Nobody is more keenly aware of how much that $2 or $3 billion a year, if saved, might do for the schools, roads, parks, hospitals, and health services of the Nation.

We have just been told on the highest authority that the United States is not facing a crisis. But when President Eisenhower made that statement he meant an immediate war crisis following the U–2 affair. Beyond question the country today faces a double crisis; it has to meet dangerous challenges both at home and abroad, and it needs its best brains and experience as never before.

The foreign crisis is the gigantic continuing struggle between freedom and communism, which demands resourcefulness, imagination, and above all, leadership. Communism is younger than most adult Americans, for it was born only 42 years ago. But how steadily it has moved from conquest to conquest, gaining strength from each trial. It has swept the 600 million people of China, now becoming an industrialized nation, within its domain. It has penetrated the Middle East, which only a few years since was completely closed to it. It has infiltrated the length and breadth of Latin America, and raises a spectral vision of bases in Cuba. In Africa communism is far more energetic than ever before. It holds great advantages of position and propaganda throughout Asia, and in the southeastern quarter of that continent has forced sad retreats on the free world. The worldwide Communist Party remains the most sleepless, efficient, and unscrupulous political mechanism known in all history. We do not know where it will next threaten us: in Quemoy, or Berlin, or Syria, or Havana. Does this not constitute a crisis?

Simultaneously, we face a domestic crisis which, if less immediately dangerous, must also be met courageously if we are to avoid disaster. It is the crisis created by an attempt to turn the national clock backward toward the 1920's when we cannot be too prompt in bringing it down into the 1960's. If we look at the recent record of the Eisenhower administration, what do we see? We see it adopting the concept of a stubbornly limited role for the Government in providing for the general welfare of the people. We see it moving further and further toward a philosophy of reactionary decentralization, and a niggardly rejection of all the bolder plans for national growth. The movement has brought a violent protest from one Republican leader, Governor Rockefeller.

This is the retrograde philosophy which President Eisenhower disclosed when he called TVA "creeping socialism"; which made him sign the bill handing the offshore oil lands on the gulf and Pacific over to the adjacent States; which led him to reject Federal development of Hells Canyon in favor of private development on a reduced scale; which made him at first coldly indifferent to the provision of medical care for the aged poor, and then ready to support what all experts declare a second-best bill. This is the philosophy which has kept the public housing program of the Government on an inadequate basis; which at first tried to limit Federal expenditures in the field of common school education to an unworkable plan for underwriting school bonds; which inspired a veto of the bill for freeing the Rural Electrification Administration from the control of the Secretary of Agriculture; and which has restricted Federal aid for the building of jet-age airports to half the amount proposed in Senator MONRONEY'S bill.

This philosophy fails to face the fact that if the present curve of growth continues, our population will reach 260 million only 20 years hence. That is the estimate of the Census Bureau; and other men point out that the same curve will produce a population 40 years hence of about 350 million. With many of our people now housed in rural and urban slums, the provision of homes for these multitudes demands thought. Our highway system meanwhile is overcrowded, dangerous, and restrictive. We do not have enough good hospitals, doctors, or medical schools, and our health-insurance plans fall cruelly short of helping the most helpless. This past winter the country had 33,460,000 pupils in its elementary schools, and 9,240,000 in its high schools; many of them in wretched ill-equipped buildings with ill-trained teachers. Our growing Nation is bursting its garments at the seams. We tolerate low standards in culture and gray codes in morals. Is this not a crisis?

In this double crisis it is imperative that we use our best brains and leadership. The issue before us transcends the State; we have a national responsibility.

What would the people of the United States have said if Massachusetts had stricken the name of Daniel Webster from the roster of the Senate while he was in mid-career, at the height of his powers? What reproaches would the country not have addressed to Kentucky if, when Henry Clay neared his climactic achievement, its voters had sacrificed his abilities to party passion? What would history have said of Nebraska if it had cut in half George Norris' long congressional service, depriving the country of his work for Muscle Shoals, his Anti-Injunction Act, and the 20th amendment? Though Webster and Clay were Whigs and Norris an independent Republican, many a Democrat voted for them in admiration for their lustrous place in Government. Every Illinoisan, whatever his party, has held his head higher these past 90 years as he remembered the name of Lincoln, a Republican; for Lincoln embodied the finest manifestation of the spirit of the State. Every Illinoisan today, without respect to party, can feel pride that his is the State of Adlai E. Stevenson and PAUL H. DOUGLAS, who are statesmen first and Democrats second. For the good of the country it is imperative that Mr. DOUGLAS be returned to Washington.

We need the example of a man who can deal with economic and social problems as an internationally recognized authority; the example of a leader who, like Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt, can make his followers waken to a trumpet blast of inspiration. And on inspiration one final word remains to be said.

The country has just seen the extraordinary spectacle of the New York Times and Life magazine presenting a series of articles on national goals. Most men would think that Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln had adequately defined our national aims. But the appearance of the series at this particular moment is significant. It appears because after 8 years of the present Republican administration many people flag in their sense of high national objects, and thirst for a new inspiration. They feel the same lassitude that sensitive Americans felt as the plodding, materialistic, listless years of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover drew to a close. They long for a brighter vision of the future, and for challenging words to rouse them to higher aims. Mr. Eisenhower has great qualities. But he has shown no capacity for making Americans feel that they are on their way to a more heroic existence and to a more fruitful leadership of the free nations.

By contrast, we can say thankfully, the leadership exemplified by Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt, by Cordell Hull, Harry Truman, and George Marshall, by Adlai Stevenson and Paul Douglas, has possessed the power to raise men's eyes to sterner goals. These men, like Jefferson and Lincoln, have combined practicality with idealism. They have disdained easy material objects; they have shown a burning faith in democracy, and in its power to make America an example for the world; their crusading spirit has given others some of their own enthusiasm. Not least in this group is PAUL DOUGLAS. The future historian will explain how much he did to expound sound national aims in his chairmanship of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, his expert reports on fiscal policy and social security, and his steady stream of enlightening speeches and articles. May that historian be able to write that in 1960 the people of Illinois showed their gratitude, their keen sense of responsibility and their comprehension of their duty to the country, by returning him to the Senate with a greater majority than ever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

NEED FOR CORRECTIVE LEGISLATION IN THE FIELD OF PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on June 24 an interim report was issued on land appraisal practices by a subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, the Democrats have control of both Houses and of the committees, yet, instead of devoting their attention to enacting corrective legislation in the field of public lands, they prefer to appoint investigative committees the purpose of which is to incite political turmoil and to deliver scattergun charges against the administration.

Through kangaroo-court hearings on BLM practices, this subcommittee has attempted to impugn the honesty of Department of Interior employees. The truth is that this Department is working with outdated public lands laws and if anyone is to blame for failure to correct this situation, it is Congress.

Mr. President, I wish to give a brief recital of the attempts to change these outdated laws.

In the 84th Congress the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] introduced a bill, S. 3444, to provide for the establishment of Federal-State lands study commission in several States. This received adverse reports from the Department of Agriculture, Bureau of the Budget, and Department of Interior, which said, "Despite our sympathy with the objectives which led to its introduction, we cannot recommend passage of the bill. This bill would, I am told, turn over public lands to the States through a piecemeal State-by-State study.

In the 85th Congress the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] reintroduced the same bill, S. 2579, with no action.

Also, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] introduced, by request, S. 1949 on May 1, 1957. It is a bill to facilitate the administration of the public lands and for other purposes. This was submitted and recommended by the Department of Agriculture. There was no action on this bill.

Also, S.J. Res. 49, introduced on February 4, 1957, by the Senators from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON and Mr. JACKSON]. It is a bill to establish a Multiple Use of Public Lands Commission. Adverse reports were received from both Interior and Agriculture.

In the 86th Congress, H.R. 7042 and its companion bill in the Senate, S. 1905, were submitted and recommended by the Department of Interior. Secretary

Seaton terms this as a most important piece of proposed public lands legislation before Congress. It is a bill to authorize the classification, segregation, and disposal of public lands chiefly valuable for urban and business purposes. It authorizes the Secretary of Interior to sell at auction to qualified governmental agencies, in tracts not exceeding 1,280 acres, any public lands which he may classify as chiefly valuable for urban or business purposes. It restricts purchasers to those showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the land will be devoted to an established or definitely proposed project or program pertaining to urban or business purposes. It limits conveyances to any one grantee in any one year for any one project to 1,280 acres. It makes other provisions relative to subdivision of land. It authorizes annual appropriations not to exceed $200,000 for administrative purposes of the act. It provides that all revenues derived from the sale or lease of public lands under this act be deposited in the Treasury and disposed of in the same manner as moneys received from the sale of public lands. It reserves patents and rights of the United States to mineral deposits. It provides for the segregation of lands upon the proper filing of a valid application to purchase same; it provides all segregations be subject to valid rights existing at the time of segregation.

The House Public Lands Subcommittee held several meetings on this bill, and on April 27, 1960, passed it over without prejudice.

Also, S. 1906 was introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and submitted and recommended by the Department of Interior. It is a bill to facilitate the administration of public lands. It would authorize the Secretary of Interior to conduct investigations, studies, and experiments relative to the improvement, management, use and protection of public lands.

H.R. 7004 is the companion bill in the House. This bill passed the House February 15, 1960. There has been no action in the Senate.

S.J. Res. 130 provides for the establishment of a commission to study the nonmineral public land laws. It was introduced by me and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] August 11, 1959. It was referred to Interior and the Bureau of the Budget, and no action has been taken in the Senate on the bill. Its companion measure in the House is H.J. Res. 492, introduced by Representative RHODES. It has received no action.

S. 1699 was submitted and recommended by Interior Department. It is a bill to consolidate, revise, and reenact the public land townsite laws. It was introduced on April 16, 1959, by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] on request. Its companion bill in the House, H.R. 6290 was introduced by Representative ASPINALL. The House held four subcommittee meetings on this bill, with no further action.

Mr. President, I come from the West. I believe I need not remind the Senate of the great importance of land to us who live in the West. The Federal Government and State government own almost 76 percent of the land in Arizona. I believe, unless my figure is incorrect, that Idaho is owned 86 percent by government. As our expanding populations continue to grow, the acquisition of these lands becomes more and more important.

Mr. President, we are operating in the West under outdated, antiquated land laws. Several of us in the Senate and in the House have been trying for many years to get these laws changed, so that the Federal Government can realize more money from the sale of these lands and so that the private individuals and States can acquire them.

Mr. President, if the Democratically controlled Senate and House of Representatives cannot enact necessary legislation, I think it is proper for the people of the Western States to look to Republicans to take over these Houses, so that we will get proper legislation.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I add to what the Senator has stated that over 50 percent of New Mexico is in ownership by the Federal Government. Nevada, I believe, is owned more than 80 percent by the Government.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

As the Senator from New Mexico realizes, Albuquerque is one of the fastest growing cities in the United States. New Mexico is one of the fastest growing States.

In days gone by, when our States of the West had populations of only a half million or less, we could live by taxing 14 or 15 or 16 percent of the land. However, now that the populations of our States have exceeded a million, and now that we anticipate in those States populations of approximately 3 million by 1970, we know we cannot support ourselves on such a small land base.

For the Senator's information, I am speaking this morning on a report which was submitted by a subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations in the House of Representatives, which has been critical of land transactions, and critical of Government employees engaged in these transactions. I merely point out that the subcommittee would be serving the country far better if it devoted its time to obtaining adequate new land laws.

The employees of the Bureau of Land Management, and the Taylor grazing employees, are bound by the law to judge the land—based on what? They must judge it on its carrying capacity, how many cows one section of land will support. In our two States we are lucky if one cow can live on 360 acres.

So that land does not have a great deal of value based upon that appraisal, an appraisal of $1.50 to $3 an acre. Now, all of a sudden, we find that lands are appraised at $1.50 or $3—and that is the only way they can be appraised under the law—for values of $100, $200, $300, and even $500 an acre for development purposes. I wish the Federal Government could get such high prices for its land.

But under the antiquated laws now in existence, the only way the land can be treated is under the appraisal system, based upon how much the land will carry. That is the only way we have of judging land in the West. So I am very hopeful that when we return in August, the Democratically controlled Congress will see to it that one of the many bills on the subject which have been introduced will be passed, so that we in the West and the Federal Government also can benefit by the transactions in land.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I fully agree with the Senator from Arizona.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK DURING THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the accomplishments of the Export-Import Bank during this Republican administration constitute an outstanding record of achievement.

This record has been compiled by my colleague the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT]. I ask unanimous consent that his compilation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the record was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK DURING THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

(By U.S. Senator WALLACE F. BENNETT, of Utah)

The overall accomplishment of the Export-Import Bank of Washington during the 7½ years of the Republican administration should be viewed in terms of the Bank's purpose. The primary purpose of the Eximbank is to assist in the financing of U.S. exports through dollar loans abroad. With minor exceptions, each dollar lent abroad by the Bank is spent in this country in the form of a purchase from U.S. manufacturers, suppliers, and service companies.

The Bank pays interest on the money it borrows from the Treasury and lends abroad; the Bank also pays dividends to the Treasury on its $1 billion authorized capital. The earned reserves are deposited with the Treasury.

For the 7½ years of the Republican administration—January 1953 to May 31, 1960—the following statement summarizes the activities described above.

	In millions
Total dollar amount of loans authorized	$4,732.1
Total dollar repayments	2,758.8
Total dollar interest on loans (income)	733.4
Interest to Treasury on money borrowed	224.6
Dividends to Treasury on $1 billion authorized capital	157.6
Operating costs	12.3
Losses charged off	2.6
Added to reserves	336.3
Total reserves and surplus as of May 31, 1960	628.9

The Republican administration encompasses a period (1954–59) during which a concerted effort was made to increase not only the dollar amount of loans, but also the number of individual loans authorized. Results were particularly noticeable in the Latin American area, due to the fact that the volume of business in Europe had slackened somewhat because of favorable results of postwar reconstruction.

Latin America

	1950–54	1955–59	Percent increase
Loans	$1,023.4	$1,643.8	60.6
Credits	(102.0)	(614.0)	502.0
Disbursements	773.3	1,166.4	50.8
Repayments	219.4	604.0	175.3

On a worldwide basis, comparable evidence of gain can be shown. At the close of business December 31, 1952, the Eximbank had on its books 305 active credits for a total of $4,134.3 million; and at the close of business May 31, 1960, there were 1,333 active credits totaling $4,732.1 million. In the number of credits, this is an increase of over 300 percent. The small difference in the dollar amount is due to huge reconstruction credits for Europe that were still active. For the same period, the dollar volume of credits authorized but undisbursed on record December 31, 1952, was $600.3 million, and at the close of business May 31, 1960, was $1.5 billion.

Another area of significant gain is that of private capital participation in Eximbank loans. The Bank's statutory authority is specific about its status with regard to commercial financial institutions. The Eximbank is to complement and supplement private capital, not to compete with it. Accordingly, the Bank does not lend where private sources are readily available. The Bank also seeks and encourages private banks to enter into Eximbank transactions without recourse upon the Bank, the exporter, or the borrower.

Prior to 1952, commercial bank participations, without recourse on the borrower or the Export-Import Bank were negligible. From 1952 to the present date, 59 commercial banks have participated with the Export-Import Bank, and without recourse on it or the borrower to the extent of $256,718,000.

It is expected that in the future, and under the impetus of the Republican program for expanding U.S. exports, the Bank's role will be even greater, as will the part played by private financial institutions. It is to be hoped that life insurance companies, with their reservoirs of loanable funds, can be induced to play a larger part in the financing of foreign trade. There are some signs of thoughts in this direction by some of the larger companies in the insurance field.

The year 1960 has seen intense interest in the national balance-of-payments position with regard to world trade. The necessity for increasing U.S. exports prompted the President to advise the Congress on March 17 that the Government should help enlarge export opportunities. In the same message, the Eximbank was charged with the responsibility for issuing short-term political risk guarantees to American exporters.

The Eximbank placed a new short-term political risk guarantee program in operation on May 23. In this program, the Bank guarantees 90 percent of invoice value of exporter shipment against noncommercial losses, e.g., inconvertibility or nontransferability of foreign currencies, imposition of foreign laws or regulations, cancellation of import license, war and civil commotion, and expropriation of goods by foreign entities.

Since the Eximbank has no field establishments, a system was devised by which commercial banks across the country would act as agents for the Eximbank in the actual issue of the guarantees. An exporter, wherever he may be, has access to the guarantee through the banks without complicated negotiation with Washington. More than 100 commercial banks have signed to act as Eximbank agents to date, with more expected to sign. Several guarantees were issued during the first 2 weeks of operation.

In addition to devising the new short-term political risk guarantee, the Eximbank has modified its medium-term transaction formulas for exporter loans, and credits, with the aim of making them more workable and attractive to both the U.S. manufacturer and commercial banks.

The Eximbank has stepped up its activity in loans involving the purchase of U.S. aircraft and aviation facilities. The Bank has participated in U.S. sales, the invoice value of which was $428.9 million. The Bank loans in these transactions totaled $242.2 million for U.S. purchases by foreign flag and private carriers, with 63 percent of the latter amount occurring in the past 5 years. In addition, $30.9 million has been lent for airports and airport equipment abroad, almost all of it during the 7½ years of the Republican administration.

Typical loans of this sort made this current fiscal year show a global distribution in the Eximbank's assistance: $25.5 million to Australia for the flag line Quantas, for three jet liners plus modification of seven other jets already owned by Quantas; $20 million to Belgium for Sabena, five jets; $6.9 million to Brazil for Varig, two jets; $16 million to the Union of South Africa for three jets; $14 million to Spain for Iberia, three jets.

(NOTE.—The above dollar amounts are not total cost of aircraft and related equipment, but rather the amount of Eximbank participation in total sale.)

The Eximbank has assisted the American farmer in selling his produce abroad. Cotton, wheat, and tobacco have been the principal agrarian commodities for which foreign sales have been financed. Of these, cotton has been the largest single commodity financed. In the Bank's 26-year history, over a billion dollars have been loaned for the purchase of U.S. cotton. In the 7½ years of the Republican administration, $524 million has been loaned for cotton exports. This amounts to roughly 50 percent of all cotton credits during the Bank's history.

In addition to cotton, tobacco, and grains, two noteworthy cattle loans, each for $5 million to the Government of Mexico, have resulted in sales of U.S. beef and dairy cattle for the establishment of Mexican herds.

To focus attention on the work of individual divisions and offices of the Eximbank, it should be noted that: (1) The Eximbank has a staff that is quite small in relation to the magnitude of its operations, numbering about 100 professional people in a total staff of 226; and (2) the contributions of individual divisions and offices are an integral part of each project or transaction, with the total effort of the Bank in each instance transcending and encompassing individual work areas. On the latter point, in a typical project of the first magnitude, findings of the Engineering Division with regard to engineering aspects and feasibility of the project would be incorporated in the staff study of the loan application. The same applies to the Economics Division which would study economic effect and economic feasibility, to the Legal Division, the Loan Division, the Private Capital Division, and the Office of the Treasurer. In this way, accomplishments of the departments of the Eximbank must be considered as units contributing to the Bank's overall progress.

TYPICAL PROJECTS IN WHICH DIVISION AND OFFICES PARTICIPATED

Peru: Toquepala copper mining project in which the Bank made the largest private single loan—$115 million to assist in opening a copper ore body in southern Peru; complete mining and processing installation to produce blister copper; started production February 1960 with the total cost of the enterprise $234 million.

Brazil: $37 million to assist in the financing of dam and hydroelectric installation of the Rio Grande.

Mexico: $46.5 million to assist in financing integrated steel mill at Monterrey.

Japan: $43.4 million to assist in the expansion and modernization of three steel facilities—Fuji, Yawata, and Toyo Kohan.

Iran: $33.3 million to assist in the modernization of state railways.

Liberia: $15 million for the development and extension of 300 miles of highway.

In August 1954, the Export-Import Bank Act was amended to increase the lending authority of the Bank from $4.5 to $5 billion to reestablish a bipartisan board of five directors, and to create an advisory committee.

It is felt that the advisory committee has been most successful in its operation. There are nine committee members, chosen from top level representatives of industry, labor, commerce, finance, agriculture, and education. Each successive committee has been exemplary in its interest in Bank activities, has put forward constructive advice drawn on a wealth of experience, and has been extremely helpful in the shaping of Eximbank policy and practice.

In August 1957, the Export-Import Bank was authorized to make loans in foreign currencies available under section 104(e) of Public Law 480. In March 1960, the Eximbank announced its 100th foreign currency loan under Public Law 480. That loan brought the equivalent dollar value of these loans to $57.2 million, the 100 loans having been made in 16 countries.

In May 1958, the Bank's dollar-lending authority was increased to $7 billion to meet increasing demand for U.S. exporter assistance—another Republican-sponsored move to help American industry and labor.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION DURING THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON] has investigated the achievements of the Federal Power Commission during the period 1953–60. His documentary report on this important agency's activities has been widely distributed, but has not as yet appeared in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION DURING THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

(By U.S. Senator NORRIS COTTON, of New Hampshire)

Today, electric power ranks first and natural gas fifth in size among the industries of the United States. The Federal Power Commission's activities are closely interrelated with the development of the Nation's vast hydroelectric power resources, its great electric utility growth, and the mushrooming spread of the relatively young interstate natural gas industry.

The FPC has a basic responsibility of protecting the public interest through its jurisdiction over interstate transmission and sale at wholesale of natural gas and electric power moving in interstate commerce, the accounts of these companies, the construction of interstate pipeline facilities, and the licensing of non-Federal hydroelectric projects. Through its regulatory activities, the Commission protects the consumer's interest and assures a healthy climate for industry in order to promote the expansion necessary to meet the Nation's rising energy needs.

The Commission's regulatory responsibilities have increased tremendously during the last 7½ years under the Republican administration because there has been phenomenal growth of the electric power and natural gas industries. The FPC, which regulates the interstate aspects of these two great industries, has carried on a continuous searching examination of its internal operations, organization, and procedures to meet these expanding obligations.

The Commission has continued to make available comprehensive statistics and other operating, financial, and cost data. The value of this service is evidenced by its widespread use by the industry, financial organizations, investors, the general public, and the Congress. In addition, through the Commission's prescribed accounting and reporting requirements, the Commission has exerted powerful influence in matching financial soundness and protection of investors with the unprecedented growth of the industries.

A. ELECTRIC POWER

During the last 7½ years the electric power industry has experienced vigorous growth.

Beginning in 1953, the installed generating capacity of the Nation's electric utility generating plants was 82.2 million kilowatts compared with 159.7 million kilowatts as of April 30, 1960. For the years 1952 and 1959, respectively, electric power production rose from 399 billion kilowatt-hours to more than 709 billion kilowatt-hours, an increase of about 78 percent.

Increases in revenues and facility investment paralleled the increases in generating capacity and production.

Without any appreciable increase in rates, the annual revenues of the electric power industry from ultimate consumers in 1959 amounted to more than $10.5 billion, compared with about $6.1 billion for 1952.

Plant investment in this same period rose from $30 billion at the end of 1952 to $58 billion at the end of 1959. Selected annual statistics for the electric power industry are shown in appendix A.

The Federal Power Commission since 1953 has issued licenses for non-Federal hydroelectric projects of unprecedented size and importance in various regions of the country.

B. NATURAL GAS INDUSTRY

Advances in the natural gas pipeline industry have been equally impressive. The interstate transmission of gas for resale has risen from about 4.2 trillion cubic feet in 1952 to approximately 7.7 trillion in 1959, an increase of 83 percent.

Natural gas pipeline revenues from sales to other gas utilities for resale were nearly $2.5 billion in 1959 compared with about $908 million in 1952. Net plant investment growth paralleled the increases in transmission and revenues, rising from approximately $3.4 billion in 1952 to more than $6.8 billion in 1959. Selected annual statistics for the natural gas industry are shown in appendix C.

During the past 7½ years, natural gas has become available in many States and regions which previously were without this service. At the beginning of 1953 natural gas was available in 41 States, while it now moves into all but 3 of the 50 States, the exceptions being Vermont, Maine, and Hawaii. The most notable examples of recent service extensions include pipelines into the Pacific Northwest and down the Florida Peninsula.

This new service required great extensions of the already giant network of interstate lines, through the issuance of certificates by the FPC.

The approval and issuance of these certificates added nearly 46,000 miles of new gas transmission lines and other facilities valued at approximately $4.7 billion.

These actions have facilitated expansion of the entire industry, and between 1952 and 1959 the number of natural gas customers increased from 18.4 million to 29.9 million. Appendix D gives statistics on certificates authorizing construction and operation of pipeline facilities since January 1, 1953.

To help meet the mounting demand for natural gas service in markets far distant from producing areas, the FPC also encouraged the development and expansion of underground storage facilities by interstate pipelines.

By this means, the companies are able to pump large quantities of natural gas into storage areas close to the using markets during the summer months, when much production and transmission capacity otherwise would lie idle.

Withdrawal of the gas during the cold winter months when demands exceed pipeline capacity enables consumers to be served without large additions to pipeline capacities.

Developed underground storage capacity is now estimated at about 2.9 trillion cubic feet compared with 1.7 trillion cubic feet at the beginning of 1953.

C. IMPROVEMENT IN PROCEDURES

To expedite the Commission's operations in considering formal matters, its Rules of Practice and Procedure, and its Regulations under both the Natural Gas and Power Acts are under constant study and review to improve their effectiveness.

Some major improvements, for example, involve: (1) A revised uniform system of accounts for gas and electric utilities to provide reclassification of utilities by size, to prescribe accounts for nuclear electric powerplant operations, and to reduce the number of expense accounts for nuclear electric powerplant operations, and to reduce the number of expense accounts classifications, etc.; (2) prescribing by rule the greater use of conferences in connection with hearings to provide for discussion of matters to be heard, identifying controversial issues, and exploring the possibilities for agreement; (3) a revised procedure for making natural gas rates on file in the Commission, but under suspension, effective by permitting the applicant simultaneously to file a motion to place rates in effect and a bond or an agreement and undertaking to refund any amounts later found by the Commission to be excessive; (4) combining when possible into one hearing noncontested applications for natural gas certificates, thereby reducing the number of Commission actions, and providing a faster response to industry needs.

An improvement in prospect is represented by the recommended legislation pertaining to delegation of certain substantive authority to one or more Commissioners or to Commission staff. Enactment of this legislation will permit further streamlining of Commission procedures and lighten the workload on an already overburdened Commission.

D. ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANIZATION

Major changes have been effected in the Commission's organization beginning with the appointment in 1954 of an Executive Director empowered to exercise the administrative and executive direction vested in the Commission's Chairman. This delegation permitted the Chairman to devote more of his time to the heavy load of policy and substantive matters confronting the Commission.

At the same time, concentrating top management responsibility in an Executive Director facilitated uniform program planning, direction, coordination, and control essential to better gearing the Commission activity in coping with the large and increasing number of natural gas and electric power matters.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during this Republican administration the agricultural credit system has been made more responsive to farmers' needs. The Farm Credit Administration has been given a new status of importance by being made an independent agency of the Government. The insured loan program has been greatly improved since 1953. The record of this administration in this area is one in which all Americans can take pride.

My colleague from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] has written a brief report on this activity, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

(By U.S. Senator GORDON ALLOTT, of Colorado)

The Farmers Home Administration, an agency of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, extends both short-term and long-term credit to American farm families, together with technical farm management assistance and guidance.

Such credit facilities enable farm families to improve and expand their operations wherever the financial resources of banks and other private lending agencies are not readily available to them. These loans are available only to those farmers who are unable to obtain credit from traditional lending institutions such as banks and cooperatives.

The Allott-Cooley bill to revise and simplify the entire authority of the Farmers Home Administration was approved this year by the House, after careful and thorough consideration and improvement by the House Agriculture Committee. Hearings have been held by the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee.

It is greatly to be hoped that this significant legislation will be enacted into law during the 86th Congress. It has been advocated strongly by, and developed with extensive help from, the Department of Agriculture and the Farmers Home Administration.

H.R. 11761 represents a 5-year evolution from the original bill with the same purpose first introduced by myself in 1956. It would establish a reasonable and organized authority for the Farmers Home Administration as a substitute for the complex hodgepodge of 35 statutes and 1,200 pages of regulations. It would allow the hard-pressed field personnel to provide more prompt, more effective, and more flexible assistance to the farmer in need of credit who is unable to obtain it from private sources.

This needed legislation is approved by the Republican administration, the House of Representatives, and the farmers. It would be a tragedy if, in the political confusion of the closing days of the session, the Democratic-controlled Senate should fail to endorse it.

In these past 7 years, the Republican administration has made the agricultural credit system more responsive to farmers' needs. In line with this objective, the Farm Credit Administration was given a new status of importance when it was made an independent agency of the Government.

In the past 7 years of the Republican administration, farmers home loans totaling approximately $2¼ billion have been made to and insured for deserving farm families.

All loans made and insured during fiscal 1960 by the Farmers Home Administration will total approximately $310 million, compared with $229 million in 1953. The following are contributing to this total:

1. Operating loans, provided to help farmers purchase equipment, livestock, feed, seed, and fertilizer, and to finance other farm and home expenses, total approximately $198 million in fiscal 1960. In 1953, the comparable figure was $130 million.

2. Farm ownership loans to develop family-type farms, to purchase such farms, to enlarge undersized farms, and to refinance certain debts amount to an estimated $43 million in fiscal 1960, as compared to $30 million in 1953.

3. Farm housing loans to build or repair farmhouses and other essential farm buildings total approximately $40 million in fiscal 1960, compared to $19 million 7 years ago.

4. The insured loan program has been greatly improved since 1953 and, despite money market conditions which make it difficult to obtain funds for this particular program, the volume of such loans since 1953 has averaged $30.4 million annually, compared to an average of $10.1 million per year in prior years.

In addition, loans amounting to $12 million are being made in those counties participating in the rural development program in 1960, thus helping the low-income farm families most in need of aid to strengthen and secure their farms and make them more efficient and profitable.

Emergency loans are also available in areas designated as having sustained a disaster such as drought or floods.

Soil and water conservation loans for farmstead and irrigation purposes have been broadened since 1954 to extend far beyond the boundaries of the original 17 western States which previously had been the sole beneficiaries of this program.

In addition, in 1956, the Farmers Home Administration was authorized to make loans to local organizations to help them finance their share of the cost of developing small watersheds.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Republican policy committee recently published a report on the accomplishments of the Federal Trade Commission during this Republican administration. I ask unanimous consent that this report be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION

The Federal Trade Commission performs a job in the field of business regulation which is of paramount significance, not only to the business community generally, but particularly to small business and the consuming public. This Commission promotes fairplay in business by attacking practices which are monopolistic, deceptive, or otherwise unfair. Some of the highlights of its achievements are:

1. During the current fiscal year, which will be the Commission's first complete year under Chairman Earl W. Kintner, the Commission has already instituted more corrective proceedings than at any time in the history of the agency since it was established in 1915. The fiscal year has not, as yet, been completed, but a new record has already been set.

2. Fiscal years 1958, 1959, and 1960 are the first 3 complete fiscal years during which the Commission has consisted entirely of members appointed by President Eisenhower. It is interesting to compare the record of the past 3 full fiscal years with that of fiscal 1950, 1951, and 1952, when the Commission last consisted entirely of appointeees under the previous administration:

Fiscal year	Employees	Antimonopoly		Antideceptive
		Complaints	Orders	Complaints	Orders
1950	654	27	16	97	63
1951	684	29	23	80	98
1952	672	29	24	75	108
1958	738	86	46	270	235
1960 (to date)	751	118	36	318	282

3. Note from the foregoing that the complaints issued during this current incomplete fiscal year alone, in both the antimonopoly field and the antideceptive field, exceed the total issued for the last 3 years put together under the previous administration. Note also that this volume of work has more than trebled with only a very slight increase in the number of employees, even though the agency took on the added duties of administering the Fur Products Labeling Act, which became effective shortly before the change of administration, the Flammable Fabrics Act, and the Textile Fiber Products Identification Act.

4. Notwithstanding the fact that the workload so sharply increased, the handling of matters has, at the same time, been substantially speeded up, as indicated by the following tables giving comparative statistics for the age of cases ending in litigation in 1952 and in 1960:

	Antimonopoly		Antideceptive
Pending number	85	182	127	233
	Percent	Percent	Percent	Percent
Under 2 years old	45	74	57	91
2 to 6 years old	34	21	23	8
Over 6 years old	21	5	20	1

5. When the first chairman appointed by the new administration took office on April 1, 1953, he discovered that 42 formal briefed and argued cases had been waiting decision of the Commission for over 30 days. Ten had been assigned to a Commissioner for report in 1953, 27 in 1952, and 5 in 1951 (3 of these on January 5, 1951). No similar problem exists today; the Commission is keeping current in its decisional work.

6. One of the most important laws enforced by the Commission is section 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended in 1950, known as the Antimerger Act. It proscribes mergers of corporations in interstate commerce where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition or a tendency toward monopoly. Although the law was amended in 1950 to cover acquisitions of assets, the previous administration gave it only token enforcement, instituting only one proceeding. Under the current administration corporate mergers have been the subject of an intensive economic study and report, and 36 proceedings have been instituted.

8. The Commission's basic job is to get people to abide by the laws it administers. The current vigorous enforcement program has been accompanied by a similar intensified effort to obtain voluntary compliance wherever possible. Recently, the Commission has undertaken the issuance of guides dealing with various kinds of practices, in order better to inform the business community of what is required to comply with the law. These have included: Cigarette advertising guides, September 1955; tire advertising guides, May 1958; guides against deceptive pricing, October 1958; guides against bait advertising, November 1959; guides against deceptive advertising of guarantees, April 1960; guides under sections 2 (d) and (e) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, June 1960.

The last set of guides mentioned represents the first time that an effort has ever been made to spell out in simple language for the guidance of the businessman what the law requires of him in an important segment of the antitrust field.

9. Notwithstanding the fact that the Commission's investigational subpena powers have been spelled out in the law since 1914, it was not until the current vigorous enforcement program was begun that the extent of these powers was litigated through the courts. It has now been established that the Commission may subpena records in the investigation of Clayton Act cases, and also subpena records of those not under investigation themselves (F.T.C. v. Tuttle (C.A. 2, 1957) 244 F. 2d 605, cert. den. (1957) 354 U.S. 925).

10. Another example of the way in which the Commission is carrying out its responsibilities through vigorous use of its enforcement powers is the procedure it is now developing whereby its authority to require reports from corporations is used in the investigation of cases involving possible law violation. This procedure enables the Commission not only to speed up investigations, but also to investigate practices of competitors in an industry on a broad scale simultaneously, and thereby avoid to a large extent the necessity of singling out a few industry members to their competitive detriment. This is another example of the way in which the current Commission is constantly trying new methods so as better to discharge its statutory responsibilities.

11. Last December, more than 50 representatives of major civic, professional, and welfare organizations met with top Commission personnel for a 2-day conference on public deception. This conference represented a major forward step toward educating and alerting the buying public about tricky false advertising practicing procedures and other tricky selling methods.

12. Recently, when attention was invited to the practice of giving payola in the broadcast field, the Commission acted promptly and effectively. Already, 85 complaints and 38 orders to cease and desist have been issued against record manufacturers and distributors.

Thus, in this agency, we see an outstanding example of one which, during the past 7½ years, has done more to carry out the powers Congress has given it to protect the competitive system than at any time in its history. Congress set up the Federal Trade Commission as an administrative agency, to handle problems in its field in several ways.

It is doing so. It is telling the businessman what is expected of him. It is advising the consumer how to protect himself. It is enforcing the laws entrusted to it by Congress as it has never done before. It has speeded up its work. And it is doing three times the job it did just 10 years ago, not with three times the people, not with two times the people, but with an almost token personnel increase of barely over 10 percent. Therefore, it is readily understandable why Mr. Henry Bison, Jr., general counsel of the National Association of Retail Grocers of the United States, stated at their 61st annual convention:

"The Commission has certainly shown great vigor and spirit during the past year. It is the outstanding Federal regulatory commission in Washington, and provides a good example of the public service which an administrative agency is uniquely suited to perform. All five members of the Commission deserve the acclaim of the food industry. And we must never forget the many able and dedicated members of its staff."

MAJOR ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the General Services Administration, the housekeeping agency of our Federal Government, has performed exceedingly well during the past several years. My colleague, the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], recently reviewed the accomplishments of this agency and wrote a report on it. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed into the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAJOR ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION UNDER THE REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATION—1953–60

(By U.S. Senator WINSTON L. PROUTY, of Vermont)

Reorganization: Complete reorganization of GSA has been accomplished under the Republican administration. This reorganization resulted in closer and more efficient working relations between GSA's central office and its 10 regional offices as well as increased emphasis on the provision of real property, personal property, transportation and public utilities, and records management services to other Government agencies.

Employment: Despite substantial increases in activities and services rendered, total employment has been reduced from 29,141 in January 1953 to 27,722 at the end of May 1960.

DEFENSE MATERIALS SERVICE

Stockpile objectives: Attainment of national stockpile objectives has been practically completed, and present emphasis is placed on proper management, preservation and security of an inventory in excess of $8 billion. GSA's Defense Materials Service has been completely reorganized to reflect this change in program direction, with a careful analysis having been completed for the purpose of (1) establishing long-range qualitative maintenance standards for all stockpile materials required for defense purposes, and (2) determining the ultimate disposal of those items in excess of stockpile objectives.

Strategic materials physical inventory: For the first time, the enormous task of taking a complete physical inventory of the 38 million tons of 100 different strategic materials at more than 200 storage locations was undertaken in late 1956 and will be completed in mid-1960. This included a complete verification of the book accounts and extensive improvements in the physical condition of stockpile materials resulting from the repackaging and repiling of over 5 million tons of materials.

Strategic materials contracts: Intensive review of existing contracts has resulted in important reduction in the Government's liability thereunder amounting, since July 1957, to $367,325,000

Nicaro nickel plant: The expansion of the Government-owned nickel plant at Nicaro, Cuba, completed in 1957 with a saving of over $7 million from funds authorized, increased the production annual capacity from 30 to 54 million pounds, thus making it the second largest nickel producer in the free world. Production costs have been maintained at a favorable level, despite substantial increases in the cost of materials and labor. In 8 years, the plant has produced almost 275 million pounds and has demonstrated both the technical and economic feasibility of the operation. Nickel sales to industry in the past 10 months have reached an all-time high, notwithstanding the adverse effects of the steel strike. Having received no acceptable offer for the purchase of Nicaro, after formal advertising, further disposal efforts will be deferred pending improvement in the political situation in Cuba. However, the fact that the plant has been kept in operation, under very unfavorable conditions, during and subsequent to the Cuban revolution, is considered a substantial accomplishment.

Disposals of stockpile excesses: Stockpile excesses have been reduced during fiscal year 1960 by approximately $83 million worth of materials, including more than $58 million worth of rubber, approximately $8 million worth of hog bristles, $4½ million worth of coconut oil, $4 million worth of abaca cordage fiber, and various other materials.

PUBLIC BUILDING SERVICE

Construction program: A badly needed construction program for Federal office buildings throughout the country to provide adequate office space for the Federal establishment was inaugurated, following nationwide community surveys establishing the need therefor. Under this program, 32 buildings have been completed, 46 buildings are under construction, and an additional 28 are being designed for location on Government-owned sites or on sites being acquired. The repair and improvement of badly deteriorated Federal buildings has been put on a planned program basis. In addition, an air conditioning program has been inaugurated for Federal buildings, where climatic conditions warrant and, through fiscal year 1960, 26 percent of the required work has been programed and financed.

Nation's Capital: In Washington, D.C., a program looking toward the ultimate elimination of unsightly "tempos" and the construction of new permanent Federal office buildings was inaugurated and is now well under way. Since 1953, 17 separate temporary or obsolete buildings containing nearly three-quarter million square feet of space have been demolished in connection with the construction program.

Construction of the Department of State addition is 96 percent finished, with completion expected by November 1960. The cornerstone of the CIA Building at Langley, Va., was laid on November 3, 1959, with completion of this building scheduled by the summer of 1961. Excavation for the new Museum of History and Technology of the Smithsonian Institution on a site formerly occupied by two World War II temporary buildings has been completed, and construction of the building is under way with completion scheduled for the spring of 1962.

Construction of Federal Office Building No. 6 on Independence Avenue is 38 percent finished, and completion is scheduled for June 1961. Sites have been acquired for Federal Office Buildings Nos. 7, 8, 9, and 10, and architectural plans are being prepared. A site has been tentatively selected for Federal Office Building No. 5. Funds for the construction of Federal Office Buildings Nos. 8, 9, and 10 have been requested in the budget for 1961, and these three buildings, when completed, will provide office space for approximately 7,000 employees, with resulting improvement in Government operating efficiency and the release of approximately 1.4 million square feet of leased and substandard Government-owned space.

Surplus disposal policies: In conjunction with the Bureau of the Budget, firm policies have been established under the Republican administration in connection with the utilization of excess and the disposal of surplus Government-owned real property. These policies have resulted in the liquidation of unneeded Government-owned real property, the restoration of a substantial number of valuable properties to local tax rolls, and a significant monetary return to the Government.

Surplus disposal program: Acceleration of a nationwide program of disposal of surplus real property has been emphasized. In addition to properties conveyed to public bodies and eligible institutions for various public purposes, including airport, park and recreational, education, health, and wildlife conservation under priority or price preference provisions of disposal laws, 1,430 properties have been sold to private enterprise at a selling price of more than $183,248,700.

FEDERAL SUPPLY SERVICE

The General Services Administration operates a worldwide procurement and distribution system for common-use items; manages excess and surplus personal property of the Government as well as its motor vehicles; determines supply requirements and regulates procurement of personal property and nonpersonal services by Government agencies; and provides advice and assistance to civil agencies in improving and strengthening their internal supply systems.

Supply procurement and distribution: Procurement for other agencies of personal property and nonpersonal services through the GSA supply system has increased from $504 million in 1952 to approximately $840 million currently under the Republican administration. Some 60,000 line items of various commodities are being made available to all Federal agencies.

The volume of GSA supply-depot transactions is reflected in the increase of line items shipped from approximately 1½ million in 1952 to over 4 million currently under the Republican administration. Improved management is demonstrated by the fact that total employment in stores operations actually declined during this period, while costs of operation per $100 of sales were reduced by almost 50 percent.

The quality of supplies, materials, and equipment purchased by GSA for other Government agencies has steadily improved under the Republican administration through introduction of modern and efficient quality control techniques.

Property management: In exercising its responsibility for promoting maximum utilization of excess personal property among Federal agencies, GSA has transferred excess Government-owned property to other Federal agencies for further use in the amount of some $864 million (at acquisition cost) since 1952. During the same period, donations of surplus personal property were approved to State agencies for educational, public health, and civil defense purposes in the amount of almost $2 billion.

Motor-equipment management throughout the Government has been strengthened by the establishment of some 56 consolidated interagency motor pools containing over 16,800 vehicles, which provide motor-vehicle services to Federal agencies at substantial savings. Over 5,000 fewer Government vehicles are utilized under this system than would have been required under individual agency management. In addition, action has been taken to improve the management, operation, and safety practices of the total Federal fleet of over 211,000 vehicles, with combined savings of over $45 million annually resulting from the introduction of these improved management practices.

Supply management: GSA further unified and increased the effectiveness and economy of Government-wide methods and systems during the Republican administration by providing helpful guidance to other agencies in modern supply techniques, and by making some 80 studies of individual agency supply systems which greatly improved their effectiveness.

Uniform and efficient contracting and procurement policies and procedures have been developed and promulgated for all departments and agencies of the Federal Government through the establishment of the Federal Procurement Regulations system, which is being steadily expanded to provide a full body of codified regulations on this subject.

In collaboration with the Department of Defense, a joint effort has been proceeding toward development of a single, standard supply catalog. GSA has concentrated on items used primarily for civilian agencies. To date, over 192,000 civilian agency items have been identified in the Federal catalog system. The number of specifications and standards developed to improve quality of commodities used by the Federal Government has also steadily increased.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS SERVICE

Records management: A Government-wide paperwork management program was initiated in 1956, as recommended in 1955 by the Second Hoover Commission. Significant progress has been made in correspondence management. The consolidation of existing agency records centers under the GSA system of Federal records centers, as recommended in 1949 by the First Hoover Commission, was virtually completed. The holdings of records in these centers was expanded from 1,630,000 cubic feet in 1953 to 5,500,000 cubic feet in 1960.

Plans have been completed for the transfer to GSA on July 1 of the Department of Defense Military Personnel Records Center at St. Louis, Mo.

National Archives: The centralization in the National Archives of all valuable older records of agencies of all three branches of the Federal Government—executive, legislative, and judicial—was completed.

Public exhibits: Through an accelerated exhibits program begun in 1953, built around the display of the Constitution, Declaration of Independence, and Bill of Rights, the number of visitors to National Archives exhibit areas was more than doubled.

Presidential libraries and papers: A Presidential Libraries System was established under legislation approved in 1955. Under this system, GSA accepted and placed in operation the Harry S. Truman Library at Independence, Mo. The Dwight D. Eisenhower Library, under construction at Abilene, Kans., has been accepted by GSA and will begin operation early in 1961.

Publication was begun in 1958 of a new series of presidential documents which are compiled, indexed, and published annually in book form under the title, "Public Papers of the Presidents."

TRANSPORTATION AND PUBLIC UTILITIES SERVICE

Traffic surveys: A program of onsite surveys of freight traffic management and transportation methods in civilian executive agencies has been completed. The survey reports contained 253 recommendations. Of this total, 242 recommendations or 95 percent have been accepted by the organizations affected. A summary report entitled, "Freight Traffic Management in Civilian Agencies," and outlining areas for economy and improvements in agency transportation operations, has been released.

Agency assistance: Based on a need revealed by our traffic surveys, an informational handbook entitled, "How To Prepare and Process U.S. Government Bills of Lading," was issued in November 1959. This booklet was designed to assist personnel in preparing and processing Government bills of lading more efficiently and economically; 22,500 copies have been purchased by industry and Government organizations through April 1960.

Transportation and public utility management savings: The traffic management program conducted by GSA resulted in a saving of $16.9 million in fiscal year 1959; and it is expected that savings for fiscal year 1960 will equal this amount.

A further saving, totaling $366,000 in fiscal year 1959, was obtained through the public utilities management program.

Action taken by GSA in connection with communication litigation has produced savings to the Government which now amount to $8 million per year, and it is expected this will grow to $15 million per year when the Semi-Automatic Ground Environment (SAGE) project is complete.

BUSINESS SERVICES PROGRAM

GSA has an active broadscaled program to assist the businessman to achieve his maximum potential in doing business with the Government, with particular attention and emphasis given to the problems and interests of small business. Thirteen business service centers and many subcenters, located in principal cities throughout the country, are daily engaged in informing small firms of the market which GSA offers for their products. The centers also provide necessary bidding documents and specifications, and counsel and advise small firms in their efforts to participate in GSA procurement and disposal programs. In the calendar years 1953 through 1959, of GSA's procurement of $3,665,676,592, there was awarded to small business $1,956,067,984, equivalent to 53.4 percent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

FACE THE FACTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] may speak for 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, unfortunately it was not possible for me to be in the Senate June 30 when the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona made some remarks at the time the Defense appropriations conference report was up for consideration.

It is a matter of opinion whether, as the Senator says, the summit failure is "one of the great triumphs which the United States and the free world have had against communism since World War II."

But it is not a matter of opinion when the Senator says, "Since 1954 our Air Force has had fighter planes which have had the ability to shoot down the U–2 even though it could fly at 60,000 or 70,000 feet."

Because that statement is not correct.

Nor is it a matter of opinion when the Senator from Arizona says, "We have aircraft in our inventory today which could attack the U–2 from above."

That statement also is not correct.

The Senator says, "Obviously the Russians have nothing like that."

Neither have we.

The Senator continues, "They have no aircraft which could zoom and attack up to 60,000 feet."

Neither do we.

The Russians have known for years, as have some of us over here, that U–2's were flying over Soviet territory.

If they had a comparable airplane, it could have been flying over our country also, because we have no combat airplane which could have attacked it at the altitude at which the U–2 can fly.

In summary, to the best of our knowledge the United States has no fighter aircraft superior in performance to the new MIG's now possessed by the Russians.

If there is any implication that because the U–2 could fly over Russia and not be attacked, the United States has combat planes which could fly over Russia and not be attacked, nothing could be farther from the truth.

We have no fighters, let alone bombers, which could fly in combat within many thousands of feet of the U–2 altitude capability.

Therefore the fact this noncombat plane has been performing its brilliant feat has nothing whatever to do with what our combat aircraft could do.

Later on the Senator compares the Soviet gross national product with that of this country.

He states that in "1958, Russia's gross income was $186 billion; ours was $427 billion." Actually ours was $441.7 billion.

He then assumes a 4.2 percent annual growth rate for the United States, and a 6 percent growth rate for the Soviets, this in his projections through 1970.

Since the Senator uses the year 1958 as the starting point for his computation, note that during the years 1953 through 1958 we had an annual growth rate of approximately 2 percent as against his 4.2 percent.

In that the Senator then says: "There is no weakness in those comparisons," let me make two observations:

First, the figures used project Russia's economic growth at a much more rapid rate than ours—a 6-percent rate is 43 percent greater than a 4.2 percent rate.

Second, if we assume a 4.2 percent sustained growth rate for the United States, that is 82 percent greater than it has been over the past 7 years.

According to analysts of the Soviet economy, their gross national product in 1951 was 33 percent of that of the United States; the Senator's figures show it as 40 percent in 1958, and 48 percent by 1970.

If the growth continues at the rates characteristic of recent years, however, the Soviet relative growth percentage will be far greater than 48 percent.

Some mention was made of downgrading our country. I believe it is a disservice to our country to contend that the facts are as we might wish them to be, rather than as they actually are.

I wish to say that I am absolutely certain that the distinguished Senator from Arizona was completely sincere in the statements he made. I have checked the facts to the best of my ability and I find they do not support the statements of the Senator.

In that connection I believe it pertinent to again refer to the following recent statement by Albert Wohlstetter, in his great article on our National Purpose:

> I doubt that the public of this country was ever less informed on matters directly affecting its life and death. On the contrary, at each great crisis the public has been reassured that no further effort is required.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator had read the RECORD this morning he would have noticed that at page 14225 the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], at my request, made a correction in the RECORD. The correction is from "1954" to "1956." I do not know where the Senator is getting his information, but certainly, having been Secretary of the Air Force, he must know that the F–100 came into the inventory sometime, I believe, in 1956. The F–100, armed with the Falcon missile, has the capability of zooming from level full power flight to about 53 to 54 thousand feet, and attack a target successfully at 60,000 feet, and probably at a little in excess of that. We have in the inventory today the F–106, F–102, F–101, and F–104, all of which have the identical capability, and even better.

When the Senator says I am incorrect in my statement, I am reminded of the comic question, "Vaz you dere, Charlie?" I say I have done it myself. I know what I am talking about.

I made the remark, and the Senator has referred to it today, that we could attack a U–2 type aircraft from above. The Senator knows that the F–104 has zoomed to an altitude of close to 100,000 feet. While I admit that we would be better off attacking from underneath by zooming than coming down from above, nevertheless, my statement is true. These aircraft do it day after day. The one rocket capability of hitting the U–2 type target is extremely good. We may not be able to do it on the first or second or third attempt, but we have aircraft in the inventory that will do precisely what I said they would do. I defy the Senator to prove otherwise.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The only place that I know of to go for this kind of information is to the top military authorities on the capabilities of our combat aircraft.

I have gone to these people, and they tell me—unfortunately the precise figures are classified—that the combat ceilings of all the fighter planes now in the inventory of the U.S. Air Force and the combat ceilings of all the bombers in the inventory of the U.S. Air Force——

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I will yield in a moment.

The figures show that the combat ceilings of all our fighters and bombers are not within many thousands of feet of the normal flying capacity of the U–2.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Of course, any plane can zoom. When a plane zooms, it in effect becomes a missile. It comes up and falls off, but it does not have combat capability in that posture.

No one has more respect that I for the development and the functioning of the U–2 aircraft. I have known about it for a long time. It has performed a great feat. I am not discounting its accomplishments. However, the American people should not believe that, because the U–2 can fly at 70,000 feet without meeting any appreciable interference from Soviet defenses, we have a combat plane which can also fly over Russia successfully. Based on the knowledge of those who know most about this field, I say such an impression would be incorrect.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. We are not talking about the combat ceiling of these aircraft. I did not even use the word "ceiling." I talked about the zooming capabilities of our fighter aircraft. I reiterate that we do have this capability. I know what I am talking about. I have done it. I do not know where the Senator gets his information. We have, in the 100 series, with the exception of the oldest 100—and even they have a good zooming capability—aircraft that can zoom and launch a rocket and shoot down aircraft at 60,000 feet. The F–104 and the F–106 can do it at 70,000 feet. The F–104 has been up to 98,000 feet, and perhaps even a little higher. That is not classified information. Those facts have been published in magazines all over the county.

Yesterday, in the colloquy with the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], I admitted that our current inventory of bombers could not attack Russia without losses. However, if the Russians do not have the capability of launching a rocket in a zoom attack and shoot down aircraft at 60,000 to 70,000 feet, then I maintain that their capabilities are similarly lower than ours at 50,000 feet, at which our bombers can fly.

As I said, I do not know where the Senator is getting his information, because he is completely wrong.

Mr. SYMINGTON. It has been my experience that the place to go for information of this character is to the people who are supposed to be the leading experts in the field. The Senator says he has flown planes like the F–100. So have I. I have flown in the F–100 at very high altitude and far above the speed of sound.

After reading the June 30 statement the Senator made on the floor, I was disturbed that it might give the impression to the American people that the performance of the U–2 showed that we have a superiority in combat planes over Russia. I did not think that was correct. Therefore, I went to the best source I know about to find out whether the figures were correct. I again say to the Senator that I had these figures checked very carefully by people who are authorities in this field.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I yield to my friend.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish the Senator would go to the schools that are teaching our fighter pilots, and find out what the pilots are being taught about what they are to do.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The Senator is getting to another point, which is what the plane might do with an air-to-air missile. That is not the question.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Absolutely.

Mr. SYMINGTON. That has nothing to do with the ground-to-air equipment of this country or the Soviet Union.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will read my statement he will see that that is what I said.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I have read it very carefully.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I maintain that we do have the capability, with our 100 fighter series, with the exception of the 105, of launching air-to-air rockets on a target at 60,000 feet, and the F–104 can do it from above. Certainly it can do it from below. I do not see how the Senator can deny these figures, when they are published time after time, not only in the Air Force Journal but in publications which can be purchased on any newspaper stand.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. ENGLE. I compliment the distinguished Senator from Missouri on his statement. The Senator from Arizona and I had some discussion about this subject yesterday, because the implication was thrown out that inasmuch as the U–2 could fly over Soviet territory, our bombers could, also. I raised the proposition that we do not have bombers that can go to 70,000 feet.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Or fighters.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely wrong.

Mr. ENGLE. We do not have them, and therefore we cannot say that the Soviet defenses have the vulnerability, based upon the fact that the U–2 flew to 70,000 feet over Soviet territory.

We simply do not have bombers that can go that high. If we sent our SAC bombers over, the Russians would have their MIG's up there picking them off, as well as, I assume, ground-to-air rockets, which the Russians have, that go up to at least 40,000, 45,000, or 50,000 feet.

With respect to the ability of the F–104 and other planes to fly high, certainly they can. They can go like a rocket. They go as fast as they can until they run out of steam. They rocket on up. They have gone more than 100,000 feet. But they come down like they are in a bucket.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. They head right for the ground. There is nothing that can be done about it.

If the U–2 were coasting along, the Russian would zoom up and would climb on top of him and clobber him, and the chances are very, very slim that he would get away.

What we are talking about are combat capabilities. The fact is—and it is undisputed by the experts in the Air Force itself—that we simply do not have, just as the Senator from Missouri has stated, fighter aircraft that have the combat capabilities which we have been discussing.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from California says I agreed with him yesterday. There is no argument about that. I admitted we would have losses in any attack which we might make on Russia. However, I maintain that the U–2's ability to fly at 60,000 or 70,000 feet over that country certainly indicates that the Russians have nothing in their inventory, in the field of ground-to-air rockets, which can go that high. So we must assume that their inability to produce something like the planes which we have in our inventory means that they do not have similar capabilities at lower altitudes.

No one has said that if we have to attack Russia, we shall come back with no losses.

However, I reiterate the point I made the other night, and I stand by it, because I have done it; I know what I am talking about. Certainly aircraft which can fly at mach 2 at 55,000 feet can zoom up to 100,000 feet, and probably more than 100,000 feet. I do not say that as a certainty, but I know they have reached 98,000 feet. They can attack on the way up or on the way down. The F–100, the F–102, and F–106 all have the zoom capabilities of rockets to shoot down aircraft flying 60,000 or 70,000 feet. I will stand by my statement, because I have tried it.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I have here, obtained from the proper authority, a tabulation showing the capability of our bombers and the capability of our fighters. These figures show that not even the latest fighters or bombers, which have been added to the inventory of the U.S. Air Force, have capability to fly as high in combat as the lowest altitude mentioned with respect to the U–2.

The point of my making this statement this morning to the distinguished Senator from Arizona is that I read his statement, and it worried me, as it worried others of my colleagues. I would not want the American people to feel that because of the brilliant success of the U–2 it is possible for our bombers to go into Russia without sustaining very serious losses, indeed. If such a mistaken impression became prevalent, it might well retard the development of our newer weapons; and that, in my opinion, could be disastrous for the future security of the United States.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I do not know what the Senator from Missouri is trying to prove. But I repeat: I was talking, and I am not talking now, about the ceilings at which aircraft can fly. Aircraft which can fly at supersonic speeds have flown at altitudes beyond 75,000 or 80,000 feet. They have zoom capabilities up to 100,000 feet, or thereabouts.

Certainly the Senator from Missouri knows that a rocket can be launched at any point in a flight, whether the aircraft is traveling at its full speed or at half its speed.

I believe the Senator does the American people a great disservice in hinting, as he usually does, that we have such an inferior Air Force and such inferior equipment.

I do not know what the Senator is trying to prove by his statement this morning. However, I will stand by the statement I made the other day. If he cares to come out to Luke Field and Nellis Air Force Base and take a ride, I will show him what an airplane with those capabalities can do.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Arizona is a noted expert in this field. He knows what he is talking about. I have learned this from experience listening to him on the floor of the Senate. Let me ask the Senator this. Do the Russians have planes with capabilities comparable to our U–2?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I cannot answer the question, because I do not know. For the first time, this morning, I heard the Senator from Missouri say that the Russians have a U–2 type aircraft. I did not know that. I know that they cannot fly it over the United States unless they fly it from Cuba or one of their bases across from Alaska; and such a plane would have a very limited range.

Mr. KEATING. Is it not true that we have been flying U–2's for a period of several years?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order previously entered, the time having expired, the call of the calendar is now in order.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 5 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. I ask the Senator from Arizona, is it not public knowledge that the U–2's have been flying over Russia for a period of 4 years, a purpose for which Congress has provided funds, and that they have obtained valuable intelligence about Russia?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have been informed by friends of mine who are in a position to know that the intelligence acquired by the flights of the U–2 is nothing short of fantastic. Again, I am not aware of the details of the information. I have seen a few of the less significant photographs. However, I am convinced from what I have heard that we now have a very complete knowledge of the missile bases and establishments in Russia.

Mr. KEATING. Is it not also true that continued efforts were made to bring down the U–2, but without any success?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I must assume that the Russian Air Force did everything in its power to bring down this aircraft. Certainly its radar must have detected the overflight. The Russians must have known exactly where the U–2 was flying, because it is not difficult for any radar to do that. I assume they used every late MIG they had, and used whatever ground-to-air rockets they had, but evidently they had no success.

Mr. KEATING. I heard the remarks of the Senator from Arizona yesterday, in which he was upgrading——

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am asking the Senator from Arizona a question.

I listened with interest to the Senator's remarks, in which he was upgrading, rather than downgrading, the capabilities of the United States. On the other hand, he was downgrading, rather than upgrading, the capabilities of the Soviet Union. I am pleased to hear this kind of talk. I am distressed when I hear, all too frequently, so much emphasis on the military, economic, and other weaknesses of our country. I gather from the remarks of the Senator from Arizona that a part of his reason for making this statement was that it has been shown by the U–2 flights that the United States has the capability of gathering intelligence which is far superior, at least in the air, to that of the Soviet Union. I wonder why those who are constantly harping on our weaknesses do not also mention our strengths. Was not that a large part of the Senator's purpose in making his statement?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would have to assume, in the absence of any definite knowledge, that the Russians have no aircraft having the capabilities of the U–2. However, I do not know for certain. The Senator from Missouri indicated in his remarks a moment ago that the Russians have a U–2 type aircraft.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I did not indicate or imply that they have a U–2 type aircraft.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What did the Senator from Missouri say?

Mr. SYMINGTON. My remarks were as follows and I quote:

> If they had a comparable airplane, it could have been flying over our country also, because we have no combat airplane which could have attacked at the altitude at which the U–2 can fly.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Then, if I inferred that the Senator from Missouri said they had one, it was because I did not understand his use of the word "if."

Mr. SYMINGTON. Let me say to my friend, the Sentaor from Arizona, that the information contained in the statement I made a moment ago came from the office of the Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will say it would be difficult for the Soviets to operate a plane over the heartland of our country, because our land is vast in size, too.

Mr. KEATING. And the point the Senator from Arizona makes is that we have capabilities of bringing down a plane of the U–2 type, if and when one is developed by the Russians, which the Russians do not now have.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; I have said that several times this morning on the floor of the Senate. Not only do we have aircraft that can do it, but we also have the Bomarc. I have more faith in the Bomarc than some of my colleagues do. But even if the Bomarc did not hit on the first shot, I assume—unless we have been fooled by the Army—that the Nike could do it, also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired.

FRED A. SEATON, THE BEST POSSIBLE CHOICE FOR VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, despite the agreement which has been entered into, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may proceed for 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, on this, the last day before we depart for our respective nominating conventions, I know that much thought is being given to the choice which must be made as to the standard bearers for our two political parties. I am confident that Members on both sides of the aisle are earnest in their desire to see nominated for the highest offices in our Nation's Government the ablest men within our parties, men whose ability, integrity, and loyalty to the founding principles of our country are unquestioned. In this regard, so far as we Republicans are concerned, there can be no doubt that RICHARD M. NIXON is such a man.

As his running mate, we must look for a man whose personal attributes are on the same high level as those of our presidential candidate.

I sincerely believe this man to be the Secretary of the Interior, Fred A. Seaton, who has served his country long and well in a variety of high-level capacities. Mr. Seaton, known to many as the "father" of Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood, has had wide experience in all aspects of modern government, and is well liked and highly respected by members of both political parties. He has distinguished himself through his service in the Nebraska Legislature, in the U.S. Senate, and in various positions in the executive branch of the Government.

As Assistant Secretary of Defense, and later as Administrative Assistant to the President and Deputy Assistant to the President, Mr. Seaton repeatedly demonstrated his outstanding executive ability. In 1956, Mr. Seaton was appointed Secretary of the Interior, and there began perhaps the most brilliant administration of that office in our Nation's history.

I am confident that we can select no finer candidate for the office of Vice President than Fred A. Seaton. He will undoubtedly be a tremendously vital asset to the 1960 Republican ticket. As each day passes, it becomes increasingly apparent that support for Mr. Seaton's candidacy is growing by leaps and bounds. Evidence of this ever-increasing support is seen in all parts of the Nation, where many States have passed resolutions endorsing Mr. Seaton as their choice for this high position of public trust.

Since June 8, 1956, when he was appointed Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Seaton has won the acclaim of the Nation for the emphasis and vision he has applied to the field of natural resources which come under the jurisdiction of his Department.

His latest public acclaim for achievement in this field came on June 20, when he was cited by many of the Nation's foremost conservation organizations for "distinguished, courageous service rendered in the conservation and management of the country's natural resources." This special award was presented at the annual banquet of the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners, and was participated in by 15 major organizations representing official agencies, societies, and millions of sportsmen and outdoor enthusiasts. It is my understanding that that was the first time that a Cabinet member was so honored for conservations achievement and service. I know that Secretary Seaton would carry the same wisdom and vision into the Nation's second highest office.

At this time I wish to introduce into the RECORD the citation which was awarded to Mr. Seaton, the man whom I honestly believe to be the best possible choice for the office of Vice President of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the citation be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Among his many accomplishments, he:

(a) Protected Federal wildlife refuges from unwise exploitation; maintained the famous Tule Lake and Lower Klamath Wildlife Refuges; advocated and actively worked for the establishment of the Arctic Wildlife Refuge; blocked encroachment upon the Wichita Wildlife Refuge; dedicated all duck stamp funds to the acquisition of waterfowl lands; and

(b) Aggressively pushed toward completion the Mission 66 national parks program; acted forthrightly to prevent inundation of the world famous Rainbow Bridge National Monument; prevented encroachment upon the Kennesaw Mountain National Battlefield Park; established the new Virgin Islands National Park; and

(c) Insisted that the salmon runs of the Columbia River and tributaries be perpetuated; promoted strengthening and broadening of the Federal Coordination Act; directed that recreational needs be planned as an integral part of all future reclamation projects; took the lead in plans to set aside and preserve seashore and lakefront areas for public use; supported wilderness preservation; and

(d) Took steps to require unauthorized occupants of public lands along the lower Colorado River to recognize Federal authority to control and regulate such occupancy; issued orders to provide public access to unappropriated public domain lands for recreational uses.

For these and other acts in the broad public interest, we, the undersigned, jointly confer upon the Honorable Fred A. Seaton this Special Conservation Award, at Salt Lake City, Utah, this 20th day of June 1960.

Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners, International Association of Game, Fish, and Conservation Commissioners, Boone and Crockett Club, Izaak Walton League of America, National Audubon Society, National Parks Association, National Rifle Association of America, National Wildlife Federation, Natural Resources Council of America, North American Wildlife Foundation, the Sierra Club, Sport Fishing Institute, the American Forestry Association, the Wilderness Society, Wildlife Management Institute.

REPEAL OF THE DISCRIMINATORY TAX ON MARGARINE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask that at this time I may speak for 5 minutes, despite the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, 10 years ago the legislation to repeal the discriminatory Federal tax on colored margarine became law. I am sure that this anniversary will bring back many unpleasant memories to the Nation's housewives of the time they used to spend tediously coloring their margarine in a mixing bowl or squeezing a plastic bag. Thanks to the repeal of the tax on colored margarine, those days are gone forever. The housewife was the most immediate beneficiary of this legislation, but the Nation's cotton and soybean industries have received a substantial share of the benefits.

Arkansas is a leading producer of both cotton and soybeans, the principal sources for the vegetable oils used in the manufacture of margarine. About $150 million each year goes into the pockets of the Nation's farmers from sale of products used in margarine. The farmers of Arkansas receive a substantial share of this income. In the last decade a sizable portion of the State's soybean and cottonseed production has gone into margarine. It is obvious that the repeal of the tax on colored margarine has aided in maintaining a healthy agricultural economy in Arkansas.

Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have a statement by me printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

It is now 10 years since the National Margarine Act of 1950 became effective, on July 1 of that year. This law occupies a unique place in our national food history. It corrected an unjust and discriminatory situation of long standing; it made possible the provision of a healthful food item to millions of consumers without tax; it opened up an important new product market for American fats and oils; and it removed an unnecessary administrative burden from the Treasury Department.

The National Margarine Act of 1950 has had, and likely will continue to have, significant effects upon our food and agricultural economy. This is a suitable occasion to review the results of the act, after its first decade of existence.

The immediate and tangible result, of course, has been to make yellow margarine available without Federal tax in interstate commerce. That consumers want and required this food product has been demonstrated by its increase in consumption from 937 million pounds in 1950 to an estimated 1,650 or more million pounds this year. Those who voted for tax-free yellow margarine voted for the consumer.

At the time when the matter of margarine tax repeal was being debated in the Congress, statements were made that prices of this food item would go up. This has not been the case. The U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics reported the average price of margarine, without Federal tax, to have been 32.7 cents a pound in 1950. The same series gives the 1959 average at 28 cents. In a period when food costs generally have been rising, margarine prices have dropped. The act of 1950 made margarine a bargain for the consumer.

A corollary result of the act was the new outlet it opened up for our American vegetable oils. In 1950 margarine was using some 689 million pounds of American vegetable oils in refined form. Today that amount has gone up to about 1,250 million pounds.

The great beneficiaries of this have been the soybean farmers of the Midwest. Some 1,094 million pounds of refined soybean oil was purchased by margarine makers last year; more will have been purchased this year. Cottonseed-oil usage is a lesser but still important factor, running about 124 million pounds this year. The lower price of soybean oil has enabled it to go into margarine as the major ingredient.

This is a fact of importance to the agriculture of such great States as Iowa and Minnesota, where soybean oil has an importance by no means incommensurate with that of butterfat. Overall, it is estimated that something on the order of $150 million or more cash income is derived by American farmers from margarine each year.

A third result of the 1950 act was the stimulus it gave the removal of old restrictive laws against margarine in many States. By 1953 all but two States have removed their prohibitions on the sale of the colored vegetable spread. Only six States still maintain their taxes. Some smaller restrictions remain in these and other States.

It is unfortunately true that in some areas margarine remains a persecuted product. Some still seem to believe that the dairy industry can be helped by injuring margarine, although I cannot believe they can be many.

One restriction that ought to be lifted as soon as possible in the interest of our armed services and taxpayers alike is that which does not permit the Navy to buy margarine for table use. I propose to continue to bring before the Congress in proper season a measure for removing this restriction.

An intangible discrimination against margarine exists in so far as the price-support and surplus disposal laws work to put free surplus butter into domestic markets once held by margarine on a merit of quality and cost. If this treatment is good enough for surplus milkfat, it is good enough for surplus cottonseed oil and soybean oil. To be fair, any surplus disposal plan that includes the purchase and disposal by the Federal Government of one finished food-fat product should include the availability, at least, of equivalent treatment for margarine.

The Food and Drug Administration need not be burdened with a job of regulating colored margarine in public eating places on the scale that is presently required. The same purpose of consumer protection could be served by a simpler and less costly system of enforcement, and this would enable the Food and Drug Administration to devote more time to the more important problems it has to cope with.

The Margarine Act of 1950 has been a success. Its purpose—fair treatment for consumers and for American farm products—has been achieved. Its history of operation has been successful. It stands as a beacon to end discrimination against pure food products.

In progress of time it may well be that the law as it now reads could be improved by simplifying some of its regulatory provisions. But its accomplishment over the past 10 years has been undeniable.

It is only fair to take up another major claim made at the time the law was being discussed on the floor of the Senate. It was then stated that such a law would ruin the dairy industry. Of course this was an absurd claim. Total dairy cash income in 1959 is estimated to have been $4.6 million, compared with $3.7 million in 1950. Milk consumption (civilian) has gone up from 111.3 million in 1950 to 119.8 in 1959.

I would be the last to say there are not important problems in the great dairy industry today. Certain it is, however, that the Margarine Act of 1950 cannot be counted as one of them. If anything, it seems to have operated to bring some dairy firms into the margarine business.

The act of 1950 has been a good law. It has proven, overall, a positive good for the country and for agriculture.

THE AMERICAN THEATER AND ITS PROBLEMS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the recent theater strike in New York dramatically pointed up some of the economic chaos plaguing this important American industry.

We have long been proud of our American theater and its achievements. But it is a slowly dying part of our culture, due to the fantastic, and ever-rising, costs of production. Every year, fewer plays are produced and more theaters close.

The situation is of immediate and important concern to all of us. This is true not only because we wish to preserve the theater, but also because a rising ticket price will affect us economically. The price of tickets may have to be raised as one method of combating the enormous production costs. Removal of the present admissions tax may well be one of the many ways our Government can help.

The American theater is praised all over the world, and plays that have been sent abroad have been widely acclaimed. This is an American industry that most of us know only from the glamorous side. Therefore, I was most interested to read two excellent stories describing in detail the economic plight of our legitimate theater.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the two articles: "Audit, Who Makes Money on Broadway?" written by A. H. Raskin, published in the New York Times of June 12, 1960; and "Who Makes Money on Broadway?" written by Daniel Seligman, and published in Fortune magazine for May, 1960.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, June 12, 1960]

AUDIT: WHO MAKES MONEY ON BROADWAY?

(By A. H. Raskin)

Twenty-five years ago the strike-eager taxi drivers in Clifford Odets' "Waiting for Lefty" stormed across the stage of the Longacre Theater shouting: "Slow death or fight. It's war." Last week all Broadway wondered whether the theater's own short-lived version of the class struggle might not have given it a push toward slow death.

True, the blackout of the footlights and marquees represented a singularly bloodless exercise in labor-management conflict. No pickets marched outside the empty theaters, and the only violence was in the angry exchanges between the negotiating teams for Actors' Equity Association and the League of New York Theaters.

The posturing and emotionalism that passed for collective bargaining was often tinged with such theatricality that one observer of bargaining in more orthodox industries suggested broadening of the Equity classification system to include the negotiators on both sides as a new category of actor.

What gave poignancy to the whole somber performance was the attention it concentrated on the gossamer financial underpinning of Broadway's world of make-believe. Actors and producers ride a roller coaster that goes down much more regularly than it goes up. The result is economic anarchy of the feast-or-famine variety, not collective security.

Overall statistics provide a poor key to the problems that are making Shubert Alley the gateway to a sable-lined distressed area. Actually, the season that ended with the June 1 shutdown was the best in Broadway's history when measured by the amount of green goods taken in at the box office.

Variety's tabulation of gross receipts at all Broadway productions showed a total take of $45,665,500. This was $5,500,000 above last season's record and the seventh year in succession to record an increase. But the explanation for the rise lay in higher ticket prices, not more ticket buyers. The number of culture-seekers who visited the theater to worship (or yawn at) the Muse in 1959–60 season was a full half-million below the 1958–59 total.

DWINDLING PRODUCTION

The long-term shrinkage in the roster of Broadway shows has created a scramble for a dwindling list of job opportunities. Only 731 of Equity's 9,600 active members were employed when the blackout began. Idleness is equally epidemic on the employer side—only about 15 of the league's 126 members were involved in the 22 productions closed by the labor dispute.

Most of the angels who invested the capital to put on the season's shows came out with clipped wings. Experts in the never-never land of theatrical finance estimate that the average loss on each dollar of investment for the season as a whole was 65 to 70 cents. However, this average covers the range from a zero return on the dismal flops to ultimate profits of 500 or 1,000 percent on hit shows.

The best way to establish what it costs to put on a typical dramatic production and what happens to the money is to study the audit reports prepared by a certified public accountant.

Picking the show is itself a controversial business. Some cynics contend that no audit is completely accurate because it cannot take into account the "ice" and other undercover payments that are an accepted but unacknowledged part of the Broadway scene. Others contend, with considerable justification, that no play is wholly representative.

Some shows have stars like Jackie Gleason, Mary Martin or Ethel Merman who draw upward of $8,000 a week; others pay extra high fees to directors or authors. The size of casts and the variety and splendor of scenery and costumes affect the operating budget.

For illustrative purposes this article will focus on the record of "The Andersonville Trial," a drama that achieved considerable critical acclaim, ran at Henry Miller's Theater for 23 weeks and finally decided to give up the ghost when the blackout was declared.

NO BIG NAMES

It had no big-name stars, utilized a single scene and involved a relatively modest initial investment of $90,000 (as against $500,000 for a musical like "The Sound of Music").

William Darrid and Eleanore Saidenberg, who coproduced the Civil War drama with Daniel Hollywood, turned over the gray-jacketed financial statements in their cluttered office on the sixth floor of the playhouse. The barometers of their prosperity are two glass candy jars on Mrs. Saidenberg's desk. When they are full, business is booming. Last week one was empty and a half-dozen lonely lemon drops formed a sparse flooring in the other.

The audit indicated why. It showed that each of the three producers, sharing a 1½-percent cut of the box office gross, had drawn less than the lowest paid Equity member in the cast during 12 of the 23 weeks. The highest yield in any week had been $153.50, the lowest $71.40. In the last 2 weeks before the shutdown, all three voluntarily renounced any share in the gross.

Plans for the production got under way in April of last year when the partners read the script by Saul Levitt. In September they drew up a budget calling for a total outlay of $90,000 and invited investors to buy 50 shares at $1,800 each. Each investor was to have a 1-percent share in any ultimate profits; the remaining 50 percent was to go to the producers.

However, by the time the play was ready to go into rehearsal, they had found it necessary to whittle their share down to 42½ percent. The 1½ percent of the gross they drew during the run of the show was to be subtracted from their eventual profits. But this became no problem because there were no profits to share.

On the basis of the play's present assets, the outside investors will get back about $30,000 of their $90,000. Proceeds from lease of road rights and possible sale of the play to the movies may give them a further return later on.

RED INK

The design and construction of the set cost $11,035, costumes $6,809, preopening advertising and publicity $10,884 and rehearsal expenses, mostly for cast and crew salaries, $17,075. Two and one-half weeks of pre-Broadway tryouts in New Haven and Philadelphia put $7,038 into the red-ink column.

In the 4 months following its opening last December 29, the 31 Equity members in the company earned a total of $147,230. The theater received $121,450 as its share of the gross (30 percent on the first $20,000 of weekly receipts and 25 percent on all over that).

ADDITIONAL FIGURES

The author, Mr. Levitt, drew $37,008 and the director, José Ferrer, $20,645. Their share would have been larger, except that they and the three top-billed actors, George C. Scott, Albert Dekker, and Herbert Berghof, agreed in April to a reduction formula under which their earnings were scaled down to offset the play's losses.

The combined draw for the producers during the entire period was $6,109. This was less than half the $13,882 paid to stagehands, electricians, and other crew members. However, the producers' percentage was supplemented by a weekly allowance of $300 for the expense of maintaining their office.

The box office receipts reached a peak of $30,660 in the week ended January 30. For the whole month of January the play had an operating profit of $13,986. Attendance tapered off slightly in February, but the profit for the month came to $10,907. March came and went like a lion. Result: an operating loss of $4,568.

The voluntary pay cut plan made April a standoff month, even though the gross dropped to roughly half of the January level. In May, for which final figures are not yet available, the producers suspended their own draw. They also made plans to cut seat prices by one-third to one-half as a means of attracting more customers, but the blackout caused them to send the show to Tait's Warehouse instead.

Everyone connected with Broadway has his own pet villain in assessing responsibility for the financial woes of plays like "The Andersonville Trial." The most usual complaint is that too much money goes to the theater owners.

But their reply is that the number of theaters here has dropped from 76 to 32 in the last 30 years and 4 more are likely to be torn down for parking lots in the next year or 2. The fact that not one new theater has been built in all that period would seem an effective rebuttal to the notion that the big profit on Broadway lies in real estate, not culture.

SURVEY NEEDED

The inability of the experts to agree on what is wrong—especially since all concur on the danger of raising ticket prices any more—points up the desirability of the fact-finding board that is to study all the problems of the theater.

There is need, too, for the kind of long-term economic statesmanship that has developed in such once-turbulent industries as coal mining and the needle trades. Show business, for all its pretensions to special status, may find itself a corpse if it does not start along a similar road toward teamwork for greater economic health.

WHO MAKES MONEY ON BROADWAY?

(By Daniel Seligman)

One day last summer, Gore Vidal, the playwright, and Roger L. Stevens, the producer and real estate operator, met for dinner at the Colony Restaurant in New York City to discuss an idea that Vidal had for a play. The characters in the play would be politicians, and in their contest for power they would illuminate some of the moral problems built into U.S. party politics today. Stevens said that he would like to produce such a play, and he urged Vidal to go ahead and write it. Vidal retired to Provincetown, Mass., to relax and think about the play. Two weeks later he started to write. He finished the first act in 1 week, and showed it to Stevens, who was enthusiastic. Stevens was also enthusiastic about the second act, which took Vidal another week to write, and about the last act, which took a third week. They agreed to get the show ready for Broadway by the spring, and solemnized their intention by signing the standard Dramatists Guild contract (which calls for an advance to the author of at least $500). Vidal's play, which is called "The Best Man," has been revised several times since that initial burst of creation last summer. However, the first draft is essentially the play that opened at the Morosco Theater several weeks ago.

The contract between Vidal and Stevens was the first of a sizable number of deals that went into the production of "The Best Man," and the $500 advance to Vidal was Stevens' first outlay; altogether he, and the several dozen investors he found, had to lay out some $105,000 to get the play to Broadway. The expenditures, the deals, and the calculations that went into the production are the subject of this article, which will also relate them to the bizarre economics of the theater as a whole.

The world of the Broadway theater is still a glamorous place, and esthetically, the theater is probably as good as it ever was. But the business of the theater seems more dismal with every passing year. Taking musicals and straight plays together, 50 shows opened on Broadway in the 1958–59 season. Only 17 of them managed to recover their backers' money and earn some profit. In the 1959–60 season, which is still continuing (it began last September and ends, by general reckoning, on May 30), the results have been no better: in mid-March only 9 shows were established as hits, 2 others had uncertain futures, and 31 had flopped, unambiguously.

At a glance, it is true, a Broadway show seems to have many of the trappings and procedures of a well-organized business. A producer finds a salable property (ordinarily, the script of a play), and forms a company (ordinarily, a limited partnership) to exploit it. He files with the Securities and Exchange Commission a statement describing the property and the manner in which he will sell it to the public. Meanwhile he has begun assembling all the employees his enterprise will need (the actors, a director, a business manager, a press agent, etc.), and arranging for a "retail outlet" (a theater) and other marketing facilities (such as theater parties). He test-markets his products out of town (usually in Boston, New Haven, Philadelphia, Wilmington, or Washington, D.C.), and advertises heavily in New York, beginning 3 or 4 weeks before the enterprise opens for business.

This all seems very businesslike, and, indeed the theater's most conspicuous figures—that is, its authors, directors, performers—appear to be making a lot of money. So do all sorts of people bobbing about in the tributaries of the theater's main stream: scalpers, talent agents, professional organizers of theater parties, the headwaiter at Sardi's. But as a place for putting venture capital, the theater compares unfavorably with the racetrack.

In the 2 years ending March 31, exactly 100 shows closed their runs on Broadway. (The figure does not include a few limited runs and return engagements.) The aggregate investment in all these shows was about $14 million. When the shows had finished their runs and paid all their bills, they had managed to recover just about $10 million. Since investors must always divide any profits with the producer, and frequently with the writers, directors, and actors too, not much more than $7 million of the $10 million found its way back to the investors.

Taking the Broadway theater as a whole, then, we may say that for every $2 invested in shows, $1 comes back. At Belmont Park, out of $2 invested, $1.70 comes back—and a lot faster too. In the theater, as at the racetrack, these averages can, of course, be misleading; some investors lose their shirts and some make big killings. About $4,700,000 of the $10 million represented clear profit (after recovery of investment) on 28 successful shows; investors in the 72 other shows never got their money back.

It would, of course, be foolish—and Philistine—to view theatrical investment solely in relation to its monetary return. Broadway angels also receive a considerable psychic income; they have the fun of being associated with a glamorous enterprise, they have the fun of gambling, and they may have the sense of virtue that comes readily to patrons of the arts (and not so readily to patrons of the racetrack). Furthermore, any losses incurred in this patronage are entirely tax deductible. But when all this is said, it would still appear that there is room for improvement in the investor's economic situation.

WHO'S SQUEEZING WHOM?

The legitimate theater was not always so unprofitable. Two decades ago, Fortune found the theater to be very profitable indeed, and reported that "If some unbelievably stagestruck angel had put up the entire backing for all the plays produced in 1935–36—a bank roll of around $2 million—he would have received net profits of $425,000, or a 20 percent profit on his investment." (See "Theater-Business," Fortune, February, 1938.) Most shows were flops even then, but their losses were more than offset by the huge payoffs on the hits. In the 1930's, hit shows often paid off their backers at 25 or 30 to 1. "Room Service," for example, was produced on Broadway in 1937 for $6,000, and returned a profit of over $300,000, of which half went to the backers. Today a big hit gives its backers $3 for every $1 they put up, and a blockbuster of a hit may pay off at 10 to 1 (this now looks like a reasonable prospect for "My Fair Lady"). Payoffs have declined because production and operating costs have risen much more rapidly than grosses. The two sets used in "Yes, My Darling Daughter," produced in 1937, cost only $2,600; the two sets for Stevens' production of "The Best Man" cost $25,000. Altogether, it is impossible to produce a straight play on Broadway today for much less than $80,000, and the cost may run as high as $150,000; for musicals the range has become $300,000 to $400,000. These figures are more than ten times as high as they were in the 1930's. Meanwhile, capacity grosses have increased only a little more rapidly than the cost of living—i.e., they are up about 125 percent. The dollar capacity of a house sheltering a straight play has increased from about $18,000 a week to about $40,000 since the 1930's.

The odds against the investor have also been lengthened somewhat over the years by the bigger bites taken out of the gross. It has, for example, become a matter of routine for performers in leading parts to get percentages of the gross, whether their names sell tickets or not. Meanwhile, the few stars whose names do sell tickets have raised their percentages to extraordinary heights and may get shares of the profits as well as of the gross. A star often participates in the profits by making a one-for-one deal—i.e., he puts up a given percentage of a show's capital and receives the same percentage of its profits. This gives him an edge over the typical investor in a typical show, who must put up, say, 10 percent of the capital in order to get 5 percent of the profits (the other 5 percent going to the producer). Stars are especially fond of one-for-one deals these days because their equities are salable, and any profits they make on the sales are capital gains. These equities date back to the time the money was invested, which might, for example, be 2 months before the show opens on Broadway. In that case the show would have to run only 4 months in order to give the star a property that could be sold to create a long-term capital gain, taxable at a maximum rate of 25 percent.

Finally, individual investors have the problem that they are not allowed to buy into many of the shows that look most promising—especially the big musicals, which in recent years have often been financed entirely by motion picture companies or television networks or by some of the well-heeled directors and performers involved in the production. "My Fair Lady," the biggest hit of the past decade, was bankrolled entirely by CBS.

THE TRIPLE-THREAT MAN

How did Roger Stevens, who is a real-estate operator, get into theater business? A tall, heavy-set man of 50, whose manner is quiet, diffident, and a bit withdrawn (except when he loses his temper), Stevens had no special knowledge of the theater until he was 40. His family, which lived in Ann Arbor, Mich., was well to do, and he went to the Choate School. But his father lost just about everything in the crash. In the 1930's young Stevens worked on the assembly line at Ford, was laid off, and later worked in a filling station; for a time he rode the rods and lived as a hobo. In 1935 he got into the real estate business and had a remarkable success; when he went into the Navy, in 1943, he was worth perhaps $500,000. By 1949 he was a millionaire.

Around that time Stevens began to feel bored with real estate and real estate people and cast about for something more stimulating intellectually. He considered opening an art gallery or sponsoring a new magazine, but finally settled on the theater. His first production was "Twelfth Night," which he did in 1949 for the Ann Arbor Drama Festival; later that year, when he moved some of his real estate operations to New York, he decided to take the show with him. It was the first of the 74 shows he has produced, or coproduced (usually the latter), on Broadway.

Stevens today gives most of his time to producing, which is an infinitely time-consuming line of endeavor. (It involves him, for example, in reading about 200 scripts a year.) He may, in fact, be the most active producer on Broadway. Stevens also finds time for a variety of collateral activities. For example, he is treasurer of the American National Theater and Academy, president of the Phoenix Theater, a director of the Stratford Theater in Connecticut, an active supporter of the New Dramatists (a playwrights' group for which he has got foundation grants), and a director of the Metropolitan Opera. He is also chairman of the finance committee of the Democratic National Committee. On top of all this, he has somehow managed to keep his real estate operations going full blast.

He is now worth about $5 million, most of it made in thin equity real estate deals—of which the most famous was the purchase of the Empire State Building by a syndicate he headed in 1951. Ordinarily, Stevens keeps his head above water by working a 7-day week, but even so there are times when his varied activities threaten to overwhelm him. In one desperate period recently, he was trying to raise $105,000 for "The Best Man," several million dollars for real estate projects, including a title I program he is sponsoring in New Haven, and at least $500,000 to pay off obligations of the Democratic Party.

Stevens has had a fairly good record on Broadway, despite the fact that he is more inclined than most producers to put on shows for nonbusiness reasons—e.g., because he likes them. He has done only a few musicals. Much more time and many more skills are involved in a musical than in a straight play. A musical must be endlessly recreated in rehearsals and out-of-town tryouts; a straight play is essentially in existence when it comes off the author's typewriter. Nevertheless, Stevens feels that a producer is an idiot if he doesn't do a musical from time to time. The payoff tends to be higher when a musical hits, and the proportion of hits appears to be somewhat higher, too. Musicals are not so dependent on good opening-night reviews. "The Sound of Music," with Mary Martin, had an advance sale of $1,500,000 when it opened last fall. (About $1 million of this was from theater parties.) Hence it was able to roll right over the lukewarm reviews by Brooks Atkinson of the New York Times and Walter Kerr of the New York Herald Tribune; it is almost impossible to imagine a straight play catching on nowadays without the reviewers' enthusiastic support.

The most successful musical Stevens has been associated with is "West Side Story," which cost $300,000 to produce in 1957, and thus far—it is still touring the United States and is going to return for a limited engagement in New York later this year—has cleared $780,000. Of his 69 straight plays, 8 have been solid hits and 10 more have been modest successes. Fifty-one of his shows lost money, but many of these were succès d'estime; Stevens suspects, with mingled feelings of pride and despair, that he may hold the world's record for producing such plays. Sixteen of his money losers, for example, were selected for inclusion in the annual publication of Best Plays, and nine others were revivals of classics.

THE FIRST BITE

The problems of the investor begin with the contract the producer has to sign with the playright. The contract signed by Stevens and Vidal for "The Best Man" is a standard document put out by the Dramatists Guild. In its printed form it covers 42 pages, not counting appendixes. In signing it, Stevens obligated himself to produce the play within a year (or give up his rights to it), and to do so "in a regular evening bill * * * in a first-class theater in a first-class manner, with a first-class cast and a first-class director * * *" The contract gives the author a veto power over the producer's choice of a director, and over the producer's and director's casting selections; and it is also explicit about the author's control of the script. What it comes down to is that the producer's only right, when he and the author deadlock over changes, is the right to abandon the project. However, Stevens has found that most authors are reasonable about making changes.

The standard contract provides that the author will get 5 percent of the first $5,000 weekly gross, 7.5 percent of the next $2,000, and 10 percent of the entire gross over $7,000. A few star authors, like Tennessee Williams, get better terms than the standard, but no one gets worse. An author may, of course, take a bad beating if he spends a year writing a play and another 6 months revising it to the producer's specifications, and then has the play fold anyway after a week on the road; in that case, he would have perhaps $1,500 to show for his year and a half of effort. But on the other hand, it is entirely possible for an author to make a considerable sum out of a play that is an investor's disaster. A play called "The Gazebo," for example, ran 28 weeks in New York last year, and at the end of that time its backers had a $51,000 loss—despite a motion-picture sale. The play's author, Alec Coppel, earned $60,000 on the Broadway run, and an additional $54,000 from his share of the motion-picture rights. (The standard division on such a sale is 60 percent for the author and 40 percent for the production.)

The author's natural preoccupation with the gross brings him into frequent collisions with the producer, who must represent the investors, and who is therefore concerned primarily with the profit picture. It is a rule of thumb that most plays break even at 50 percent of capacity—typically at around $20,000 a week in a house with a $40,000 capacity. So while the show is just breaking even, the author is earning close to $2,000 a week. Authors are endlessly nagging producers to advertise more heavily—which tends to increase gross, but may reduce the profit—and imploring producers not to close down shows that are limping along at a loss. All things considered, writing for the theater today can be an immensely high-paying proposition, and it probably creates more millionaires than production does. Vidal himself generates a tremendous output in several different literary lines, but none of them have been as profitable for him as plays. At 34, he has written eight novels, and averaged only $5,000 apiece for them. He can make $10,000 for an hour-long television drama and he has got $50,000 for a motion-picture script. But his first play, "Visit to a Small Planet," earned him close to $350,000. He is now rooted in the 85-percent tax bracket, and has been trying, unsuccessfully, to find some way of spreading out his playwriting income. He has been talking to Stevens about the possibility of having the author's royalties banked, and paid out over a period of years. There are some sizable legal difficulties about doing this so that it really reduces the tax liability; and the problem is further complicated by the Dramatists Guild's dark suspicion of any arrangement that allows producers to hold authors' money. The guild has been protesting a deferred-payment deal made by the author of another current show, to Vidal's intense annoyance.

Like other unions in the theater, the Dramatists Guild has considerable power over the producers. Before a producer signs the standard contract with a playwright, he must first sign a so-called producing manager's contract with the guild itself. The latter contract stipulates that any other writer the producer subsequently signs up must also be a member of the guild or join it within 30 days. A producer who put on a play by an author who was not a guild member would thereafter be blacklisted by all guild members; in addition, the guild would almost certainly get the other theatrical unions, including Actors' Equity, to boycott the offending producer. The guild's stance, again like that of many other theatrical unions, seems to violate the Taft-Hartley Act's prohibition of the secondary boycott—but no one has ever done anything about it.

THE ECONOMICS OF DIRECTING

Last October, Stevens sent a copy of "The Best Man" to Joseph Anthony, a successful and experienced director (The Lark, Marriage-Go-Round), and asked whether he would like to do the show. Anthony was interested, and he was hired quickly. A director's remuneration, unlike an author's, is not standardized, and is usually settled in negotiation between the director's agent and the producer; by custom, a director gets a flat fee and a percentage of the gross, and sometimes he gets a percentage of the net profit, too, but the figures vary. The outcome of the director's most recent effort affects his bargaining power heavily, as Anthony recently observed, perhaps ruefully. (His most recent effort had been a show called "The Pink Jungle," which closed out of town last fall.) He feels strongly that directors' pay scales should be standardized, somehow, and he is on the board of the newly organized Directors Guild, which hopes to do that.

Anthony's agent and Stevens finally agreed on these terms: the director would get a flat fee of $5,000; 2 percent of the gross until the investment was recovered, and then 3 percent; and 5 percent of the profits.

When Anthony was hired, he and Stevens and Vidal reviewed the script, and agreed on some changes. "The Best Man" is a story about the contest between two candidates at a national political convention; the entire action of the play takes place in two hotel rooms in the 48 hours before the contest is decided. One of the candidates is an attractive egghead-liberal type, who has had, however, a rather mixed up personal life. The other candidate, the "heavy," is an amoral power seeker, devoid of real convictions. A third major figure in the play is a shrewd, folksy ex-President. In the first draft of the play, Vidal had the heavy getting the nomination. Neither Stevens nor Anthony liked this ending, and Vidal got to be unhappy about it, too. He wrote in a number of references to a "dark horse"; the present ending has the egghead-liberal throwing the dark horse his support, and getting him the nomination. Stevens and Vidal also decided to take out a number of sharply critical remarks about both Eisenhower and Stevenson, and not to identify the political party holding the convention. (In the first draft it was the Democratic Party.) Stevens also persuaded Vidal to locate the action in a Sheraton hotel. (The first draft of the play described the furniture as "early Conrad Hilton.") This change was made after Stevens swung a deal with the Sheraton management which provided that it would furnish the sets, thereby getting a plug for its hotels—and saving the production about $5,000 in set construction costs. The Hilton chain, incidentally, has been discussing a similar deal with the producers of a musical to be called "Carte Blanche."

THE ECONOMICS OF STARRING

For the hero's part, Stevens was able to get Melvyn Douglas, who agreed to work for 10 percent of the gross, with a $2,500 minimum. Stevens did not accede to Douglas' additional demand for participation in the profits. The part of the ex-president was filled by Lee Tracy, who finally agreed to a rather complicated deal: a base salary of $1,500, plus 5 percent of any gross over $35,000, until the show recovered its investment; after that a flat 5 percent of the entire gross.

The part of the amoral power seeker proved hard to cast, for professional actors these days tend to shy away from unsympathetic roles. "There used to be a lot of actors who relished the heavy parts," Anthony noted recently. "Now actors have got this idea that it will be bad for their careers if they become identified as bad or weak or abnormal." Frank Lovejoy, much of whose experience has been in TV, finally signed up on the same terms as Tracy's.

The other roles (17 in all) were filled on a straight-salary basis. Total salaries for the actors in "The Best Man," excluding the three males stars: $2,900 a week.

Two other persons took small nibbles out of the gross. Jo Mielziner, who designed the sets for "The Best Man," received one-half percent of the gross (plus a fee of $4,000). And Stevens himself took a standard 1 percent of the gross until the show recovered its investment.

At this point, then, the investors-to-be were committed to giving the various persons associated with the show about a third of the gross,[1] plus $2,900 a week. Later, the salaries of other employees (e.g., stagehands, wardrobe assistants, publicity men), and various other expenses (e.g., advertising), brought the production's fixed costs up to $8,110 a week.

THE HIGH COST OF DARKNESS

In addition to all these other operating expenses, some 30 percent of the gross must ordinarily be assigned to the theater that houses the show. That sounds like a lot, but the figure is hard to reduce, for several reasons.

Out of their 30 percent, the theater operators must provide virtually all the employees needed to keep the theater functioning. (The major exception is stagehands, some of whom are hired by the producer, some by the theater.) The employees of a Broadway theater always include at least one manager, treasurer, assistant treasurer, carpenter, electrician, property man, flyman, and matron, as well as two or more porters, ushers, watchmen, and stagehands; sometimes these employees are supplemented by assistant managers and musicians. Every one of these employees belongs to a union. Most of these unions limit their memberships, most of them run what are in effect closed shops, and most of them participate vigorously in any determination by the theater operator about the number of employees he needs. A typical theater housing a typical straight play would have perhaps 35 employees; their weekly pay would add up to about $3,500. The theater's fixed costs would run to perhaps $3,000 a week (including rent or the interest on investment). With costs of about $6,500 and revenues of 30 percent of the gross, the theater breaks even when the production grosses about $22,000—which is about where the production breaks even too. But given his high fixed costs, the operator is often better off with a show limping along at only $18,000 than he is with a dark house. And so he may make some concessions to the producer, perhaps even cut the rent, in order to keep the show going and his own house light.

Because of his big stake in a show's success, a good theater operator ordinarily reads the script before he books the show. However, he is apt to lower his standards considerably in the late spring, when few shows open, and when a dark house is in danger of staying dark until the fall. The trouble with opening in the spring is that it does not leave much time for a show to recover its investment before New Yorkers begin to desert the city. A smash hit can keep on going right through the summer, but a so-so seller is apt to have a shorter run if it opens in the spring than if it opens in the fall. With all these considerations on his mind, Stevens felt that March 31 was about as late as he could bring "The Best Man" into town. (Another reason he wanted to open by then was the fact that plays opening after March 31 are not considered in the balloting for the Pulitzer and other prizes—and Stevens thought his play might be a contender.)

The theaters' vacancy problems have persisted over the years, despite the steady decline in the number of Broadway theaters. In 1938, Fortune lamented the fact that the number of Broadway theaters had declined from 79 to 44 in the past decade. Today there are 32 such theaters, and "Broadway" now extends all the way to 54th Street east of 7th Avenue. In the year ended May 30, 1959, these theaters had a combined annual capacity of about $80 million; i.e., they would have grossed that much if every theater always had a show, and every performance was a sellout. In fact, they grossed $40 million. The theaters were operating, then, at about 50 percent of capacity—a figure which suggests that, taking them altogether, they were just about breaking even.

A $25,000 PARLEY

In seeking a theater for "The Best Man," Stevens' position as a producer was not exactly typical. For one thing, he is himself a director of, and stockholder in, City Investing, Inc., which owns three theaters outright, partly owns another, and leases one other. Its wholly owned subsidiary, City Playhouses, Inc., manages all five of these and also manages a sixth (the Anta Theater), on which City Investing holds a mortgage. Beyond that, Stevens is linked to City Investing by the fact that its president, Robert W. Dowling, has been, in effect, a coproducer of many of Stevens' shows.

[1] That is, 10 percent to Vidal, 10 percent to Douglas, an average of 5 percent each to Tracy and Lovejoy, an average of 2½ percent to Anthony, 1 percent to Stevens, ½ percent to Mielziner. Total: 34 percent.

Stevens' alliance with Dowling has an infinitely complex background, but the main point of the alliance is a simple one: to beat the odds against theatrical investment by integrating several different operations. When Stevens first got into the theater he produced shows independently (e.g., Twelfth Night, or with another freelance producer (e.g., Peter Pan, with Peter Lawrence). In 1951 he joined the Playwrights' Co., which had been formed in 1938 by S. N. Behrman, Sidney Howard, Robert Sherwood, Maxwell Anderson, and Elmer Rice, so that playwrights could produce their own plays. The Playwrights' Co. was successful at first, but when Stevens joined, its capital was about exhausted. Over the years Stevens has produced 37 plays through the Playwrights' Co. In 1953, still trying to expand the scope of his operations, Stevens joined forces with another well-heeled young producer, Robert Whitehead, who had produced Member of the Wedding, and tried to buy the Theater Guild. The deal collapsed, and Whitehead and Stevens then formed a producing company called Whitehead-Stevens. This company and City Investing in turn formed Producers' Theater, Inc. (each company has a half-interest). In addition to producing plays, Producers' Theater has long-term leases on two theaters, the Morosco and the Helen Hayes, and it has a 40-percent equity in the lease on the Lunt-Fontanne.

In general, Producers' Theatre has first call on any script that comes to Stevens, and will produce the play if he, Whitehead, and Dowling all agree on it. If Dowling vetoes the play, it may then be produced by Whitehead-Stevens. If Whitehead vetoes the play, it may still be produced by Stevens in the Playwrights' Co. (If Stevens turns down the play, Whitehead may produce it himself in Robert Whitehead Productions.) As it happened, "The Best Man" did not go through all this screening. Because the play is about politics, Vidal wanted to be sure that it would be produced by someone whose political sympathies were similar to his own—i.e., eggnead-liberal; so he took the play directly to Stevens, who is producing it in the Playwrights' Co. However, it may be that firm's last production; three of the original members have died, and Stevens plans to fold up the company later this year and replace it with an independent producing organization of his own.

Producers' Theatre was planned as an integrated organization that would not only produce and house its own plays, but finance them too. Stevens, Dowling, and Whitehead were fascinated by the thought of the money they could make if they could collect all three ways on a smash hit; Stevens has calculated that this parlay would be worth about $25,000 a week to Producers' Theatre. But they have never been able to bring it off. The closest they came was with O'Neill's "A Touch of the Poet," a fair hit, which cleared about $26,000 in a run of 36 weeks. Whitehead and Stevens have often thought wistfully of what might have been if they had persuaded Dowling to come in with them on "Bus Stop," a tremendous hit of several years ago (it earned $337,000 in a run of 60 weeks). It was produced by Whitehead-Stevens, financed principally by other investors, and played in a theater owned by Irving Berlin.

When Stevens began seeking a theater for "The Best Man," his first plan was to put it in the Morosco, which Producers' Theater rents, and which then sheltered "Silent Night, Lonely Night" (a Playwrights' Co. production). Stevens suggested to his partners in Producers' Theater that they might find it profitable to let the Playwrights' Co. have the Morosco on special terms: Producers' Theater would be allowed to take a 25-percent interest in the show on a one-for-one basis, i.e., would be entitled to 25 percent of the profits; and in return for this concession the Playwrights' Co. would get some concessions on the theater's rental price. This deal would have expedited the financing of the show, which, in February, was going slowly. In the end, Stevens could not persuade his partners in Producers' Theater to invest in "The Best Man." However, he was able to get them to absorb a little more than the theater's usual share of operating expenses. Dowling and Whitehead agreed to this chiefly because "Silent Night, Lonely Night" was obviously running out of steam and, with spring not far off, they were especially eager to get a new tenant lined up fast.

MUTTERING IN THE RANKS

The financing of "The Best Man" went slowly for several reasons. One was that Stevens had to devote more time than usual to his real estate operations (he had a March 1 deadline for raising money for his New Haven real-estate project). Another was that Stevens' regular investors have taken a bit of a beating this season. Two of his shows, "Cheri" and "The Flowering Cherry," closed last fall with aggregate losses of $225,000; another show, "Five Finger Exercise," is earning a good profit; but "Silent Night, Lonely Night" did not recover its $85,000 investment; and "The Tumbler," which Stevens produced just before "The Best Man," lost $113,000 and survived only five performances in New York. Under the circumstances, some of Stevens' regular investors were muttering.

Stevens' steadiest backers in the past year have included Robert Lehman, senior partner of Lehman Bros., Mrs. Mary Lasker, the philanthropist, William Zeckendorf, president of Webb & Knapp, and a sizable sprinkling of other real estate men, including Alfred R. Glancy and Benjamin Tobin, who are old friends of Stevens' from Detroit. Over the years, Stevens has also had his share of the venture capital poured into the theater by several heavily diversified "angels" like Peggy and Howard Cullman, Band Leader Meyer Davis, and Louis Lurie, a San Francisco real estate man.

The actual job of raising the money for "The Best Man" began on February 16, the day after the SEC cleared the offering circular, and the "Notification under Regulation A," filed by the Best Man Co. Altogether, the production was budgeted at $105,000, and in addition the investors would be subject to a 15-percent overcall; i.e., if the production ran short of money the investors would have to put up an additional 15 percent. If this overcall failed to cover all the production's obligations, the producer himself would be liable for the difference. The usual reason for invoking the overcall is heavy losses sustained in the out-of-town tryouts. Stevens did not expect that to be a problem with "The Best Man," and he proved to be right. (The show had a net loss of only $1,300 in its trial runs in Wilmington and Boston.)

The production budget (which proved to be fairly realistic) was broken down this way:

Scenery	$16,000
Designer's fee	4,000
Props	4,000
Costumes	4,500
Electrical equipment	5,450
Director's fee	5,000
Rehearsal expenses	13,300
Advance advertising	10,650
Legal fees	2,500
Producer's bond	14,700*
Theater deposit	5,000*
Author's advance	500*
Reserve for out-of-town losses	10,200*
Other miscellaneous	9,200
Total	105,000

Starred items are recoverable.

Investors in the Best Man Co. were offered a total of 50 units, or shares, at $2,100 each, and they could buy half units or quarter units if they wanted to; that is, an investor could get in for as little as $525. The job of soliciting prospective backers was done in part by Lyn Austin, an employee of the Playwrights' Co., who is listed as associate producer of the show; by letter or phone, she got in touch with many investors who had backed Playwrights' Co. productions in the past. However, the backers who had been losing heavily with Stevens were not approached at this point.

Meanwhile, Stevens had made a deal with Don Herbert, a young producer who has his own sources of investment money. The deal provided that Herbert would raise 25 percent of "The Best Man's" capital and in exchange would receive 7 percent of the net profits. By mid-March Herbert had raised $27,000 and Miss Austin had raised $35,000. Her biggest sale was 10 units to John S. Seidman, an auditor and accountant who has a substantial theatrical business, and who has been one of the more successful Broadway angels over the years.

On March 9, the day the show opened in Wilmington, more than $40,000 of "The Best Man" was still unsold, and Stevens decided, tentatively, to take this chunk for himself. Then the show received good notices in Wilmington, and Variety's critic reported, in the issue out March 16: "By the time 'The Best Man' reaches Broadway, it should be ready for the hit class." The play also received good notices from the critics in Boston, after it moved there the following week. By March 18, Stevens was beginning to feel that he should give some of his old, bruised, investors a chance to get in. He made a few calls in the week of March 21, and sold $7,875 worth of the show to Zeckendorf and $4,200 worth to Glancy. Another real estate friend of Stevens, Michael Butler, called and asked how much he could get in for. Stevens let him have $14,700 worth. By March 31, when the show opened on Broadway, Stevens had sold out all of his own interest.

As the foregoing may suggest, Stevens has an odd kind of financial problem in putting his own money into his shows. Over the years, it has been his custom to invite backers in readily when his shows are doing well, and to leave them alone when his shows are doing poorly. This means that his own stake is apt to be biggest in his poorest shows. Inevitably he has lost a lot over the years in his own productions.

One of his most disastrous ventures was a show he produced in 1958, called "Listen to the Mockingbird," by Edward Chodorov, who had previously written a hit called "Oh, Men; Oh, Women." Stevens thought the show was going to be a success and assumed he would have no trouble about the financing. But when he saw the play in rehearsal in New York, he felt that it was in bad shape and decided not to go to his investors just yet. Then the play got bad reviews in Boston, and Stevens decided to keep the whole show for himself. However, he managed to convince himself that this would not really be too expensive; as it happened, he and Zeckendorf were then involved in a complex real estate transaction in Providence, R.I., that, Stevens thought, would bring him $350,000 of taxable income that year. "Listen to the Mockingbird's" losses could at least be written off against this income. But it didn't work out that way. A series of flukes washed out the real estate deal; meanwhile, the show had been heavily rewritten, and got mixed reviews in Cleveland and in Washington. On opening night in Washington, Stevens decided that the show had some possibilities, after all, and late that night he went to Chodorov's hotel room to say he had made up his mind to bring the show to New York.

As if on cue, the telephone rang, and Stevens received the news that the National Theater in Washington was in flames. That did it: he left his sets and his cast smoldering in Washington and folded the show. Of his $100,000 investment, he recovered only $30,000 from fire insurance.

CAN THE "ICE" BE MELTED?

There are several different ways in which one may think about the economics of the Broadway theater. Since the theater, by and large, does lose money consistently, those who try to think of it purely as a business ordinarily come away from the subject with some feeling of frustration. The fact that most investors regularly take a pounding, while so many persons employed in the theater regularly live in high style, makes it evident that, in effect, some kind of subsidization is taking place: that is, a variety of wealthy individuals, most of them in the highest tax brackets—and all of them able to write off their theatrical losses against income—are siphoning several million dollars a year into Broadway. All of this suggests that a change in the tax laws might some day undermine the theater. As it happens, the Internal Revenue Service is currently looking into some changes in the taxation of limited partnerships, and these might well complicate the financing of Broadway shows. In an effort to end the theater's dependence on tax dollars, reformers are endlessly coming up with plans to make the theater self-supporting. Most plans hinge on two main facts of life on Broadway.

The first is the fact of "ice." This is what scalpers charge for theater tickets, above the box office price, and also above the $1.25 that brokers can legally add. No one knows how much "ice" there actually is on Broadway these days, and Stevens, like virtually every producer on Broadway today, declines to discuss the subject. There is, however, a widespread suspicion that if all the "ice" could somehow be redirected to the backers, theater business would be profitable. The flops might not be helped, but the income on the hits would be raised substantially.

It has, for example, been estimated that the "ice" on some of the very biggest musical hits of recent years ran well over $50,000 a week when the shows were at their peak; several hundred seats in the theaters were being sold over the legal price by scalpers. The markups vary from one production to another, and from night to night, of course, but tickets with a box office price of $18 a pair have been retailed for $60. The scalpers who sold them paid perhaps $50 at the box office which meant that $32 of "ice" had been split somehow or other among the box office employees. Theater operators, theater party agents, playwrights, and others who have ready access to tickets may get in on the "ice" and sometimes the producer is in on it too. (Stevens is known as one of the producers on Broadway who have always kept hands off the "ice.")

How might that "ice" be redirected to the backers? One proposal considered in the State legislature last year, and rejected, is simply to repeal the $1.25 limitation, and make it legal for a successful production to charge brokers whatever it can get for tickets. Thus, on tickets that were scalped at $60 a pair, the production might recover, say, $50, instead of $18. Such a free market in tickets to hit shows would create some new problems, e.g., the producers would have to keep an eye on the box office employees (and the investors would have to keep an eye on some producers), to ensure that the price reported paid to the production by the scalpers was the real price. Actors' Equity and most other theatrical unions have always opposed repeal of the $1.25 limit, arguing that some restrain on ticket prices is necessary to a healthy theater, and asking for better policing of the present law.

The second fact of life is the monopoly-union situation. Some of the unions, having restricted their membership rosters, then demand that only union members be hired, impose more workers than the producers need, and raise their pay to high levels. Many stagehands who belong to Theatrical Protective Union No. 1 routinely earn $4 to $6 an hour, and by holding several jobs (many of them work in television too), and collecting several kinds of premium pay, a fair number earn over $200 a week without unduly exerting themselves. The unions get away with it, in part because there is uncertainty whether Taft-Hartley, which prohibits the closed shop in other industries, can be applied to the theatre. (Is a show that tries out in Boston and then comes to New York "interstate commerce"?) Moreover, producers seldom have an occasion on which it makes sense for them to fight the unions. "When you have a hit," Stevens remarked recently, "you always feel that you can't jeopardize the investors' money by getting into an argument with the stagehands. When you have a flop, it doesn't matter—you're not going to be around long anyway."

UPSTAIRS AT SARDI'S

"The Best Man" opened on March 31, at the Morosco, under some sizable handicaps. One was the date, which gave the show less than 3 months before the summer slump. A related problem was the show's high operating budget. The bite taken out of the gross by the performers, the director, the author, the designer, the producer, and the theatre came to 64 percent of the gross, which is probably about average these days. However, the $8,110 of fixed costs is higher than average; and so "The Best Man" must gross around $23,000 a week—60 percent of capacity—just to break even. At $30,000, the production would clear only $3,000, which would not enable it to recover its investment before the summer. At $40,000, or capacity, the show would clear about $8,000 a week and would recover its investment before the summer. For it to do that, however, it would clearly have to be a smash hit.

On opening night, the audience at the Morosco seemed enthusiastic; but opening-night audiences are notoriously poor clues to a play's success. After the show, Stevens threw a huge party in the dining room upstairs at Sardi's. Vidal, Anthony, all the performers, and several dozen other persons connected with the production, and their friends and relatives, came to the party from the theater, sat down to some drinks, and speculated hopefully about the reviews. Around midnight, Stevens got a phone call. It was from Hobe Morrison, the first-string Variety critic, who reported that he liked the play a lot and planned to give it a tremendous review. At about this time the room began to buzz with a report that Walter Kerr of the New York Herald Tribune was calling the play a "knockout." Several minutes later, copies of the New York Daily News and the New York Mirror were available, both with rave reviews. The Herald Tribune showed up around 12:30, and the rumor about Kerr proved to be correct. When Brooks Atkinson of the Times also pronounced "The Best Man" a hit it very plainly was.

The show has, in fact, got the best reviews of any straight play produced in several months. It might well gross more than $3 million during its run on Broadway. This would mean, among many other things, that Vidal would make $300,000 in royalties (plus what he made from a movie sale). Douglas could make $300,000 too. Anthony could probably raise his director's fee next time out. And Stevens would be unabashed about approaching his whole list of investors next time. The show should clear no less than $400,000—i.e., the investors who paid for it would get back their investment plus $200,000. Stevens has been euphorically thinking about the problem of getting it through the summer—of 1961. He added, the other day, "When you have a hit, it all seems very easy."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in this connection I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a short article which was sent to me by the United States Information Agency. The article was taken from Soviet bloc propaganda, and is entitled, "'Cultural Lag' In U.S. Capital Noted." I think this bears upon the two articles to which I referred a moment ago, and also on the proposal for the establishment of a cultural center in the Nation's capital.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"CULTURAL LAG" IN U.S. CAPITAL NOTED

Radio Moscow sees Washington exposed to provincial culture and suffering from official disinterest in the arts. The broadcast said that the U.S. Capital is culturally not even comparable to the smaller European capitals. It lacks an opera house and a suitable concert hall, and performances have to be given in a "lecture hall" in one of the local universities; its only permanent theater performs in a "soap factory building," soon to be razed. "There is great apathy in Congress toward anything which has a relation with culture," Moscow quoted a Congressman as saying. In fact, the commentator continued, in 1955 President Eisenhower vetoed a bill which "demanded" governmental recognition of "the importance of developing the arts and culture in the country." To save the "appearance" of Washington, "urgent measures" are now being taken to build a national cultural center through private donations, amounting to about $70 million. Said the commentator: the U.S. Government "spends billions of dollars on spy planes and atomic bombers, but begs money" for building such a center.

EXPERT URGES UNITED STATES PUSH AUTOMATION STUDY IN RACE WITH RUSSIA

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled, "Expert Urges United States Push Automation Study in Race With Russia." The article is a very revealing one, and should cause all of us to give pause, and to consider just how effectively we are proceeding in our competition with the Russians for the improvement of the efficiency of our industry.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPERT URGES UNITED STATES PUSH AUTOMATION STUDY IN RACE WITH RUSSIA

Moscow, June 30.—A top American expert on automation today urged creation of a U.S. Government department to help keep ahead of the Soviet Union in this field.

"We have nothing like their Institute of Automation and Telemechanics and we ought to," said Prof. Rufus Oldenburger of Purdue University, president of the American Automatic Control Council.

"American research is scattered with no central guidance center. This has produced much healthy competition, but the system should be supplemented by our Government.

"The functions of a government department would be to make increased monetary grants to existing institutions, maintain a scientific staff of its own—even though this might duplicate work being done elsewhere—and support publication of books and papers which could not pay their way commercially."

Oldenburger said he believes the United States still enjoys a commanding lead over Russia in automation, but added that his information on Soviet industrial developments is limited.

"They are strong in the theoretical field, but they lag in the application of what they have learned," he said.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to state that I have requested, as urgently as I am able to, that the Antarctic Treaty be brought up for consideration before the adjournment. The administration is strongly in favor of the treaty. The committee has reported the treaty—and, I think, without dissent. It would be a great tragedy if this opportunity to proceed with the treaty in the national interest were passed over. If tomorrow or next month we find the Russians or any satellite nation installing missile bases in the Antarctic, we shall have only ourselves to blame, for refusing to proceed with a treaty which will give us some assurance that we will have inspection and control rights throughout that enormous area.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. GRUENING. What is there to prevent any satellite not a signatory to the treaty from installing a missile base with the connivance of the Kremlin? Russia's satellites are not signatories to the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If one takes the position that a treaty is nothing but a scrap of paper and is worth nothing, I would agree with the Senator from Alaska.

But if the 12 countries signatory to the treaty abide by it, I think the treaty will be worthwhile, because today we do not recognize that any country has sovereign rights in the Antarctic. In fact, during all the years in which we have had contacts with the Antarctic, we have refused to recognize that any country has sovereign rights there; and the Russians take the same attitude.

If at the present time the Russians insisted on installing missile bases there, at the present time we could do nothing about that except fight a war about it, for no established rule of international law prevails in that area.

This situation is unusual. We do not recognize any sovereign rights on the part of any other country there, and we have not asserted any sovereign rights of our own in that area, which is the only place in the world where such a situation exists.

This is the only treaty with Russia which provides for complete inspection. Any signatory may proceed to inspect any and all sites at any time and any activity going on in the area.

I wish to say that I certainly will regret it if the Senate does not act on the treaty before the adjournment, because if the Senate fails to do so, it will only be inviting or making it possible for someone to begin to establish some site or sites in that area; and I think all of us would regret that.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I believe it would be a great mistake——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, debate is not in order at this time, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak on this matter for 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I believe it would be a great mistake for us to ratify the treaty at this session.

In a few months we shall have a new President and a new Secretary of State. This issue is of tremendous importance. I do not interpret the treaty at all in the way in which the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee interprets it.

I have no doubt that he is far more equipped to judge these matters than I am. But as I have read the treaty I do not find myself in agreement with his statement that our rights are amply protected.

For instance, I notice that article IV provides, in part, as follows:

ARTICLE IV

1. Nothing contained in the present treaty shall be interpreted as (a) a renunciation by any contracting party of previously asserted rights of or claims to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. ENGLE. I express the hope that the treaty will not be brought up today, in the closing hours of this session.

I have a speech to make on it. The Senator from Alaska has one on it. There are other Senators who have speeches to make. This is a very important matter. We are coming back in August. At that time we can take it up, and at that time the people of the country can give this matter more attention. I am sure there are facts which should be brought to the attention of the people of the country who have no idea of the importance of this matter to our country, and we ought not to act precipitately on this matter in the last hours of the session, when we are coming back in August, and can debate it at that time and inform the American people of the very important interests to our country that may ride on this matter.

Mr. GRUENING. I am in full accord with the statement of my colleague from California. I wish to single out one proviso in the treaty which points up the comment I had begun to make and that is clause (a) of article IV, which states:

Nothing contained in the present treaty shall be interpreted as:

(a) a renunciation by any contracting party of previously asserted rights—

The United States has not previously asserted any rights; it appears to have no intention of so doing—which is hard to justify. Therefore we would be foreclosed from so doing if we ratify the treaty. There are other reasons why we should not act on this treaty in haste.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, are we on a call of the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order previously entered, at the conclusion of the morning hour, the Senate will proceed to the call of the calendar; and the Chair would suggest that a bill on the calendar be called, on which 5 minutes is allowed, at which time the Senator from Georgia can speak.

Mr. RUSSELL. I appreciate the suggestion of the Chair. I am somewhat familiar with my rights. When the next bill is called I have a brief statement to make.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employees engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEATING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to make a very brief observation or two with respect to the so-called Antarctic Treaty. I have no objection to the treaty being taken up today, or any other day, provided there is a fair opportunity given to all Senators to discuss that issue as fully as they desire. I have some remarks I wish to make with respect to that treaty when it is called up.

In my opinion, Mr. President, this is one of the most important issues that has been before the Senate, in the form of a treaty, for a very long time. It would be a very great mistake to approve this treaty without a most careful analysis of its terms and the effect it will have on the future of this country.

Witnesses have appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee, of which I am a member, to discuss the various missions that have been undertaken to the Antarctic area. The Navy has testified that one purpose of those expeditions was to establish and insist upon the territorial claims that are ours by right of discovery and exploration. But for some strange reason, these claims have never been entered officially, though the Armed Services Committee has strongly urged that this be done.

Mr. President, we have a large number of carriers that are too large to pass through the Panama Canal. We must move those carriers through a strip of water about 500 miles wide between the tip of Argentina and the Antarctic Continent in order to get them from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We can do this now under the advantages that we hold by right of discovery and exploration—a right that is justly ours under the law of nations that is centuries old. This treaty would completely foreclose and deny our rights. One result would be to endanger and jeopardize the free movement of our big carriers from the Atlantic to the Pacific through these waters in the Antarctic area.

I am very apprehensive that the adoption of this treaty would be a great step in liquidating the future security of this country.

I am willing at any time to have the treaty come up, but I will oppose any effort to curtail free and full discussion of the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I cannot let this statement pass without some comment. We gave notice last Friday, a week ago yesterday, that we would like to call this treaty up Monday, and at the request primarily of the Senator from Georgia, it was put over from day to day——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I only asked that I have 1 day's notice before the treaty was brought up. Is that an unreasonable request?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. For the RECORD I am stating only that a week ago yesterday, as contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I asked the deputy majority leader to make the announcement that we would like to call the treaty up on Monday. I only said, as I understand it, at the request of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, it was put over from day to day.

Mr. RUSSELL. It was not. I asked only that I be given 1 day's notice before it was motioned up.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am only stating what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. RUSSELL. No, it was not put over from day to day at my request. I merely asked that I be given 1 day's notice before it was taken up, so it was put over only 1 day at the request of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thought I was told by the majority leader that the principal reason why it could not be taken up on Tuesday or Wednesday was because of the opposition of the Senator from Georgia. I may have misunderstood him. If so, I apologize to the majority leader. I said it was an important treaty, and that it was of interest to this country, and that if we are to prevent Antarctica from being chopped up into many sovereignties, including Russia and China, this treaty appears to be the only way of preventing the very thing the Senator from Georgia is interested in seeing prevented. I am as interested as he is in preserving our right to access and passage. Our only difference is in the way to do it. I completely disagree, as I very seldom do, with the Senator from Georgia, but this treaty was before our committee. We also had the Pentagon representative there. We had an admiral there representing the Pentagon.

He was asked by me specifically what the position of the Pentagon—the Army, Navy, and Air Force—was on the treaty. He said, "We endorse the treaty. It is in the national interest and in the interest of the defense of this country." The record is there for anybody to read. This was in open session. Every witness from the Government supports the treaty. There is no difference in our objective. We are all interested in preserving the security and integrity of this country. The only difference is that I believe, and the Government believes, and the Pentagon's official representative believes, and so stated, that this is the way to protect the interests of this country.

If we are not to have it acted on in the last day of the session, I do not kid myself. If the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] wishes to prevent its being considered and brought up, I know I cannot stop him.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have not asked that it not be brought up.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator has advised that it should not be brought up without extended consideration. Around here we interpret that language, on the last day of the session, in only one way, namely: It is foolish to bring it up, because we could not pass it. We know the Senator from Alaska is against it. I know he can have his way. I do not kid myself. I am trying to say for the RECORD I think it is a great mistake to let it go over, because I do not know how long these other signatories are going to stand by and accept the status quo without any action by us. I think it will take only a short time before they will say, "Well, we cannot get any action out of the Americans. We will follow our own way." I think that is what will happen. I think they will be justified in so saying. I only want to say I did not wait until the last day of the session to try to bring it up. I have been trying to bring it up from the very day the Committee on Foreign Relations passed on it.

We gave formal notice on Friday a week ago yesterday that we would like to consider the treaty on Monday. I am not complaining that the Senator asked for a day's notice. I thought we were giving a day's notice when we announced on the floor on Friday that we would consider the treaty on Monday. That is 2 days' notice. I thought that would satisfy the Senator. On Monday, the Senator from Georgia, I guess, said, "I want another day." All I was told was that the majority leader said, "I do not think we ought to bring it up. The Senator from Georgia does not want it brought up."

I do not blame the majority leader for going along with the Senator from Georgia. No man in the Senate deserves consideration of that kind more than the Senator from Georgia. I am simply stating my position. I think the Senator from Georgia is completely wrong in his interpretation of the effect of this treaty. I cannot think of any other way to exclude the development of the bases which would endanger the very thing the Senator describes, so far as passage of our aircraft carriers through the strait between South America and Antarctica is concerned. If the Senator wants to move in that direction, something like this treaty must be provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Georgia may proceed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, did I use my 5 minutes on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 5 minutes have expired.

The clerk will call the next bill.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I object.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The bill (H.R. 5054) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 with respect to the marking of imported articles and containers was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the merits of the treaty in an intermittent, sporadic fashion with my distinguished friend from Arkansas. I am sure the Senator knows the very high affection and regard I have for him. I happen to entertain entirely different views from those he holds with respect to this treaty.

I am sure we can develop and debate the matter in complete good humor, without any personal feelings. The Senator did go into the merits of the matter, and the Senator said that if we delayed the treaty, some of the signatories——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber? I cannot hear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. Some of the signatories might withdraw. I will say that in my opinion it would be very difficult to get some of them to withdraw, because the treaty would give to Soviet Russia rights Russia does not have in any shape, manner, or fashion at the present time, under the ordinary rules and laws which have heretofore guided nations in making claims by right of discovery and/or exploration.

The Senator referred to the fact that Red China might make a claim. Red China is not a part of the treaty. Red China is not in the United Nations. Red China cannot come in to sign the treaty under the agreement and the terms of it. That is one of the reasons for my objection to the treaty. It would tie the hands of the United States, and Russia and the other signatories would be under no obligation whatever to help us throw out an interloper like Red China, if Red China were to undertake to move in and to preempt this area, which is justly ours by right of exploration and discovery.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am not opposed to considering the treaty. I am ready to consider it today, and to debate it today and to debate it on the 4th of July. Indeed, Mr. President, I cannot think of any way I could better spend the 4th of July than by standing on the floor of the Senate of the United States and objecting to and resisting this treaty. I think I would be contributing to the independence of these United States in the future, which the 4th of July has symbolized in the past.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. In view of the very clear statement my friend from Georgia has made, in order to help me make some plans for the immediate future, would I be overstating the case if I were to suggest that it would seem unlikely the Antarctic Treaty could come to a vote this afternoon or this evening?

Mr. RUSSELL. It will require at least 2½ hours, because my speech will be that long.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of Calendar No. 1820?

Mr. GRUENING. Yes, there is objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

RAY C. THOMPSON

The bill (H.R. 10793) for the relief of Ray C. Thompson, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I wish to respond briefly to the Senator from Arkansas on the Antarctic Treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRUENING. I have 5 minutes, Mr. President; do I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object?

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GRUENING. The junior Senator from Arkansas, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee whose attention I should like to have, says that if we do not sign the Antarctic Treaty Antarctica is likely to be broken up into a lot of little nations. I have a map which shows the area to which the United States would be entitled by right of discovery and exploration, which indicates we would be entitled, if we asserted our claims, to 80 percent of the explored Antarctic area. The United States has not asserted our claims. If we sign this treaty we shall be forever foreclosed from asserting those claims. The treaty makes that specific. It says, in article IV, section 1:

> Nothing contained in the present Treaty shall be interpreted as:
> (a) a renunciation by any contracting party or previously asserted rights of or claims to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica;

If we sign this treaty, not having asserted the claims, while we accept the claims of other nations, we shall be forever foreclosed from asserting our claims.

This matter is so important that it seems to me fantastic to try to settle the question on the last day of the session. While I am perfectly willing to debate the treaty at length, I know we cannot come to a conclusion that soon. I hope the view of the distinguished junior Senator from California will prevail, and that the treaty will go over until we can have a thorough discussion of it, and not on the final day of the session. I intend to speak at some length on this subject when it is before the Senate. I have a speech which may last 2½ hours. I am sure other Senators will wish to discuss the treaty.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. I have a speech which will last at least an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I am in hearty accord with the expression of the distinguished Senator from Alaska and the Senator from California in regard to this treaty.

Mr. President, I intend to speak on the treaty. I may speak at length. This is a very important treaty. I feel it will mean a great deal to the national defense of our Nation.

I commend Senators who are interested in asking that more time be given for consideration of such a very important treaty.

Mr. GRUENING. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alaska has expired.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of Calendar No. 1820?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5054) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 with respect to the marking of imported articles and containers, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment, on page 2, line 12, after the word "account", to insert "This subsection shall not apply in cases where the Secretary of the Treasury finds that compliance with the marking requirements of this subsection would necessitate such substantial changes in customary trade practices as to cause undue hardship and that repackaging of the article in question is otherwise than for the purpose of concealing the origin of such article."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

RAY C. THOMPSON

The bill (H.R. 10793) for the relief of Ray C. Thompson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 338) relating to tenure of office of individuals appointed to administrative and policy-making posts in the Federal Government, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Over, Mr. President, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

STATEMENT ON COMMITTEE BILLS AMENDING FEDERAL SECURITIES LAWS

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, in connection with the passage of Calendar No. 1828, Calendar No. 1829, Calendar No. 1830, Calendar No. 1831, and Calendar No. 1832, to have a statement printed in the RECORD prior to the passage of those bills.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILLIAMS OF NEW JERSEY

On June 28 of this year, I introduced and reported for the Banking and Currency Committee five bills to amend the Federal securities laws administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission. These bills, S. 3769 through S. 3773, would amend the Securities Act of 1933, the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Trust Indenture Act of 1939, the Investment Act of 1940, and the Investment Advisers Act of 1940.

The recommendations contained in these bills are the outgrowth of the Securities and Exchange Commission's legislative program dating back to 1953. The proposals embody the best judgment of the Commission based on its experience in administering present law revised in some cases to meet objections of the securities industry. The Subcommittee on Securities held 7 days of hearings on the bills as they were introduced in the 86th Congress, S. 1178 through S. 1182. These bills were voted out by the subcommittee with amendments on June 1 and 2, 1960. Staff consultations with the Commission and with the industry on the subject of the committee amendments to the bills as introduced resulted in further modifications.

In view of the succession of modifications made to the original proposals, the Banking and Currency Committee decided to vote out clean bills, S. 3769 through S. 3773 with accompanying reports, Senate Reports Nos. 1756 through 1760.

Recognizing the short time remaining in the 86th Congress to insure legislation by both bodies, the committee was forced to postpone consideration of controversial amendments originally proposed by the Commission. In coming sessions, I hope that the small number of controversial items can be given the serious study they deserve. In my estimation, the instant amendments make important changes in the Federal securities laws for the purpose of affording more protection to the public investor. They represent either the SEC's original suggestions or those of the industry approved by the Commission.

S. 3769 would amend the Securities Act of 1933 in a number of respects, in order to bring it up to date and to strengthen the Commission's injunctive powers and the criminal sanctions to prevent or to punish violations of the act.

The injunctive power of the Commission, an effective weapon against fraudulent selling, is expanded to make it clear that the Commission may enjoin any person who is aiding, abetting, or inducing another person to violate the act. In addition, specific criminal liability under the Securities Act would be imposed on persons who willfully make false statements in any document or application filed with the Commission, in addition to a registration statement.

In addition, it would make a number of technical changes to bring the act up to date.

S. 3770 would amend the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. The principal amendments made by S. 3770 would (1) extend regulations over registered brokers' and dealers' margin, extension of credit, and proxy practices directly instead of indirectly; (2) expand the power to make rules over financial responsibility of brokers and dealers, and over the lending of customers' securities by brokers and dealers; (3) increase the power over denial or revocation of broker-dealer registration; (4) expand the power to suspend trading in any registered security on an exchange or on all exchanges; (5) create the power to suspend trading in the over-the-counter market; (6) add a $50-a-day fine for late filing of certain reports; (7) create jurisdiction to decide who was a "cause" of broker-dealer revocation; and (8) expand the SEC's authority to suspend or withdraw the registration of a national exchange.

The major concern of the bill is to aid the Commission in enforcing compliance with the act. Some of the important weapons against fraudulent operators included in the committee bill are new statutory disqualifications for broker-dealer licenses; wider definitions of orders and transactions to discourage manipulations; and a prohibition against aiding and abetting violators of the act.

A second purpose of the bill is to increase jurisdiction of the Securities and Exchange Commission in the over-the-counter market. This area plays a crucial role in the securities markets. In number of issues traded it is much bigger than all the exchanges combined. Congress enacted certain general provisions affecting it in 1934, and when additional information was gained, added more requirements in 1936 and 1938.

Among the present proposals recommended by the committee is an amendment allowing the SEC to suspend trading in the over-the-counter market. This power parallels to some extent that existing for listed securities and should be of great benefit to the Commission in preventing frauds in the over-the-counter market.

Several of the amendments recommended by the SEC would have provided for additional time for postponement before granting or denying applications of brokers and exchanges for registration. Other amendments sought to extend the period of time available for suspension of trading in listed securities, and to create new power of suspension for securities traded both on exchanges and in the over-the-counter market. In recognition of the difficulty of affording the applicant the safeguards envisaged by the Administrative Procedure Act within the limits imposed by the 1934 act, the committee approved the periods of postponement as proposed. The same desire to protect the applicant prompted the committee to afford the affected party or company a hearing or opportunity to have a decision rendered after a certain period of time, and to permit a company to know when suspension of trading of its securities would terminate. If experience under these time limitations shows that additional time is needed, the committee expects that the Commission will advise it.

In addition, it would make a number of technical changes to bring the act up to date.

S. 3771 would amend the Trust Indenture Act. The single amendment contained in this bill would grant the Commission additional power to exempt certain companies which have been unable to amend trust indentures issued for their bonds.

S. 3772 would amend the Investment Company Act of 1940 in a number of respects. Many of the amendments would clarify certain exceptions to the definition of an investment company required to register under the act, proved necessary by the administration of the act since 1940. The amendments include provisions which would (1) require a separate recital of policy for each "fun" of an open-end investment company which issues more than one series of stock; (2) limit investment by diversified investment companies in other investment companies to other diversified investment companies; (3) require that "bank custody" of securities of an investment company include all cash assets of the company; (4) limit the equity investments of face-amount companies to prevent their obligations from becoming unduly speculative; and (5) define such terms as "depositor" and "share of stock."

In addition, it would make a number of technical changes to bring the act up to date.

S. 3773 would amend the Investment Advisers Act of 1940. The bill would amend the act in a number of respects. The more significant of these amendments would (1) provide new grounds for disqualification of an applicant for registration; (2) grant new power to postpone effectiveness within certain limits; (3) authorize the Commission by rule to require the keeping of books and records and the filing of reports; (4) permit periodic examinations of a registrant's books and records; (5) empower the Commission by rule to define and prescribe means reasonably designed to prevent fraudulent practices; (6) prohibit fraud by those advisers exempt from registration; (7) extend criminal liability to include a willful violation of a rule or order of the Commission; and (8) provide a less restrictive definition of the term "investment counsel."

The Investment Advisers Act now has few substantive or regulatory provisions. On the analogy that investment advisers are similar to brokers as regulated under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the bill would amend the act so as, in many ways, to regulate them in a similar manner. New disqualifications for practicing as an adviser would include violations of the Exchange Act of the Securities Act of 1933. In recognition of the difficulty of affording the applicant the safeguards envisaged by the Administrative Procedure Act within the limits imposed by the Advisers Act, the committee approved a longer period of postponement before a hearing must be granted on the application for registration as an adviser.

An important measure to combat the fraud apparent since the war in the Nation's stock markets would be the grant to the SEC of rulemaking power over fraudulent activities. The bill would also give the Commission the power to insist on proper bookkeeping by advisers and to conduct unannounced inspections of those records. S. 3733 would likewise safeguard the public by prohibiting fraud by those advisers exempt from registration and by extending criminal liability to include a willful violation of the Commission's rules.

In addition, it would make a number of technical changes to bring the act up to date.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I commend highly the members of the staff who have worked diligently, patiently, and effectively for a long period on this complex legislation, and have with SEC cooperation been in a major way responsible for shaping the legislation as it appears before the Senate today. I particularly want to thank Mr. Matthew Hale, and Peter Reece, of the staff, and Mr. Robert Kaufman of the staff of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS' TAX RETIREMENT ACT OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 10) to encourage the establishment of voluntary pension plans by self-employed individuals.

FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I had in mind discussing today before the Senate what I think will be one of the great issues of the 1960 campaign. My reason for discussing the issue of foreign trade before we go home is that I desire to lay before the Senate and before the country a program upon which I would like to get comment during the recess so that it might be considered more deliberately after we return and in the next session of 1961. Members will find this one of the subjects of the greatest interest to business and labor back home.

The fundamental thesis that I think the country needs to know most seriously is the significance in the winning of the cold war, which is inherent in winning the trade war.

It is my view that during this Presidential campaign, we are going to take a solemn national resolution to spend what it takes and to do what is required in concert with the rest of the free world to win the cold war. For this purpose I propose a new comprehensive trade policy backed by suitable legislation.

Success or failure of the politically oriented Soviet bloc state trading system will be a decisive factor in whether we can win the cold war. To win the cold war we must also win the trade war. The result of the trade war will very largely determine how the cold war will come out. Just as the race in missiles and rockets has shown a very serious narrowing of the gap as between ourselves and the Communists, so the trade race is showing the same direction. Just as in respect of missiles and rockets it has been absolutely essential for the United States to move vigorously into the situation and to have more defense than before, the same is true in trade.

In September 1955, Chairman Khrushchev said: "We value trade least for economic reasons and most for political purposes."

The Communist bloc nearly doubled its trade with the free world between 1954, the year marking the start of the Communist economic offensive, and 1958, the latest year for which reliable statistics are available. Soviet bloc trade with 41 nations in the less developed areas of the free world more than doubled between 1954 and 1958, rising from $870 million to $2.126 billion in those 5 years. By the end of June 1960, the Soviet bloc had concluded 290 bilateral trade and payments agreements with 46 free world nations, most of them in the less developed areas, thus doubling the 148 such agreements with 31 countries which were in effect at the end of 1954.

If present trends continue, the Soviet bloc could become the principal trading partner of several key nations in Africa, Asia, and Latin America by 1975. Yet, it is very clear that trade with the Soviet bloc must not be permitted to become a vital factor in either the political or the economic survival of free world nations. To win the trade war, the United States must launch programs directed at these objectives:

First. The establishment of new trading areas in the free world. The European Economic Community (EEC), the European Free Trade Association—EFTA—the Central American Customs Union and emerging Free Trade Area, and the Latin American Free Trade Area which is in the process of formation provide markets for some 40 percent of U.S. exports with more than 25 percent going to the European areas. Continued access to these markets is of the greatest importance to the American economy and to our foreign policy objectives, and the United States must develop a trade policy geared to the new economic world alinements. Yesterday, on July 1, tariffs came down by 10 percent and 20 percent among the 13 members of the EEC and the EFTA, respectively.

A further cut in international tariffs is scheduled among the EEC countries in 6 months. We must have policies through which we can negotiate, which will keep these economic blocs open to the entry of U.S. products.

Second. Acceptable progress in the economic development of the newly developing areas of the free world is essential to winning the cold war. U.S. imports from these areas annually provide them with dollar exchange more than four times greater than the economic aid in public grants and loans which we extend to them and some 10 times greater than the new direct private capital invested in them from the United States.

The dollars earned by exports to the United States enable the developing nations to purchase between $5 billion and $6 billion annually of U.S. goods. These goods are essential to their economic development efforts.

Third. The requirements of our expanding domestic economy require expanded foreign trade. Export markets must be broadened and cultivated in order to provide a stable outlet for U.S. production, especially important during periods of business recession in the United States. This means that exports should take more than the 8 percent to 9 percent of domestic production of movable goods which they have accounted for during the past decade, and should exceed $30 billion annually by 1970, as compared with the present rate of $18.5 billion. The increasing needs of our productive machine will require expanded imports of raw materials and other goods which we can only purchase through exports. The very nature of our system of free enterprise also requires fair competition from imports in order to advance the interests of American consumers—an estimated 215 million by 1970.

A comprehensive trade policy should provide U.S. producers—business and labor—with safeguards against unfair competition from imports and the sudden inundation of our markets in specific items. Imports are an integral part of a program for trade expansion, and they can be oriented at the same time toward the needs of a growing economy and to meeting increasing international challenges which we face.

I ask unanimous consent to include a table of U.S. exports and imports in recent years from World Trade Information Service, part 3, No. 60–6, U.S. Department of Commerce, and a table on Public Law 480 exports from the President's July 30, 1959, report on this program.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JAVITS. The first 4 months of 1960 show an increase in merchandise exports of 22 percent over 1959 and running at the annual rate of about $18,500 million per year while merchandise imports are ahead by 6 percent at the annual rate of almost $15,500,000 a year. Following is an editorial from the New York Times of June 8, 1960, on this subject:

HEARTENING TRADE FIGURES

Merchandise exports of the United States in April of this year totaled $1,806 million, the highest level achieved in any previous month in almost 3 years, or since May 1957, when the figure totaled $1,813 million. For the 4 months of 1960 ended with April, U.S. exports show an increase over the corresponding 1959 period of $6,307 million, or 22 percent. By contrast, imports for the same period were up by only $5,058 million, or 6 percent. Thus the first 4 months of 1960 reveal a surplus in the country's visible trade of $1,249 million, a total more than treble the figure of $399 million recorded in the first 4 months of 1959.

The decade of the 1950's was marked by a series of annual international payments deficits for this country, broken only in the single year 1957. Up to 1958 these deficits—which are settled by shipments of U.S. gold or by the acquisition of short-term dollar balances here by foreigners—were not sufficiently large to be disturbing. But the picture assumed serious dimensions when the deficit reach $3.4 billion in 1958, and then climbed to $3.7 billion in 1959.

The phenomenon most clearly identified in the public mind with this disturbing adversity was the coincidental narrowing of the favorable gap in our merchandise trade. In fact, the drop in our commercial surplus led many to conclude that the United States was no longer able to compete successfully with the other leading industrial nations—that, as the popular phrase had it, we had priced ourselves out of the world markets.

The improvement in our commercial trade position in recent months, while of dramatic proportions, doesn't hold the entire answer, by any means, to solving our international payments difficulties. But those who agree that the question confronting us is not whether we can solve this problem, but whether we solve it the right way, will find the latest figures on the Nation merchandise trade doubly encouraging; for this development not only promises to reduce the payments gap from its 1958 and 1959 dimensions, but to do so not by the backward-looking method of imposing trade restrictions of one kind or another but by the healthy process of expanding the world's volume of our international trade and payments.

I am working on legislation to round out the U.S. tariff and quota structure, as administered by the President, with the advice of the Tariff Commission and under the supervision of the Congress, to give the President increased authority to safeguard reasonably U.S. business and labor. I plan to introduce it after Congress returns in August, but I shall proceed to outline its general provisions now in the expectation that the discussion and constructive comment they evoke will assist me to further refine the bill prior to its introduction next August. The proposed legislation would provide the President with the authority to safeguard industries adversely affected by imports while aiding them through the stimulation of productivity and diversification. The rapidly mounting demands made upon the productive capacities of U.S. labor and management, as well as the national duty to help those who suffer hardship in the national interest require that this new dimension be added to our import policy.

Under the authority of the bill I am drafting, the Federal Government would be able to extend loans and allow tax incentives to businesses, extend technical and financial assistance to communities, and provide retraining and relocation assistance to workers (as well as added unemployment payments and liberalized old age and survivors insurance benefits), whenever they are found eligible under the provisions of this legislation.

There are four key differences between the legislation I am working on for a "Comprehensive Trade Policy" and proposals for so-called adjustment assistance which have been made before.

First. The President's decision to extend assistance would not depend on a finding by the Tariff Commission that imports are threatening or causing serious injury to a domestic industry—the present "escape clause" formula. Thus, even if an industry is meeting import competition but to do so must lay off workers, or relocate and consolidate its operations, or invest large amounts of capital which one or more of its members cannot raise, the workers, communities, and businesses adversely affected by this changeover will be eligible for assistance. I think that this factor in my legislation is becoming of increasingly great significance, as more and more imported products are coming upon the American marketplace; U.S. private industry with its tremendous potential in capital and technique can and will meet nearly all foreign competition—but in doing so it may have to make major readjustments which could work hardships upon some of its component parts.

Second. The President would be authorized to provide tariff or quota protection to a domestic industry, upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission, but at the same time may provide for a gradual reduction of such additional protective measures over a period not to exceed 7 years if loan and other assistance is extended to workers and owners in eligible parts of the affected industry. Thus, foreign customers will be assured of the U.S. intention not to subsidize domestic industries permanently behind impenetrable protective walls, while the American consumer and taxpayer will be assured that governmental measures are being applied with the purpose of stimulating productivity and increasing the ability of domestic producers to compete on the open market in the free enterprise tradition which has always been the determining factor in our Nation's high productivity.

Third. The President would be authorized to extend the same kind of protection, upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission, and the same kind of assistance which I have described to industries or component parts of industries which because they have not been the subject of any reciprocal trade tariff concessions are not eligible for relief under the escape clause or peril point procedures. Although only about 5 percent to 10 percent of U.S. imports presently would fall into this category, the rapid development of new industries both in the United States and abroad could change this picture. Even more likely, imports within that small category could take on a new significance for domestic producers. Therefore, they should be covered by this legislation.

Fourth. Experience with the Export Control Act and with other programs requiring close coordination of activity among various Federal departments, agencies, and officials indicates the advisability of authorizing the President to delegate the execution of the Comprehensive Trade Policy to that agency or official of the executive branch he deems best situated for the performance of the task. This may well be the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for International Affairs, who would act as Chairman of an Advisory Committee on Import Policy composed of other appropriate members of the Government. A revolving fund to provide assistance to businesses and communities not susceptible to such help under other provisions of this legislation could be used at the Assistant Secretary's direction, with the various Bureaus and Offices of the Department of Commerce at his immediate disposal for counsel and administration. The present Advisory Committee on Export Policy under the chairmanship of the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, although its functions are of more limited scope, may well serve as a model for the President's decision on where and how to delegate the authority given him under this legislation.

The program would set up no new and potentially cumbersome administrative machinery, but would utilize already established governmental facilities by directing parts of their already existing functions to the problem of meeting import competition. The President would be authorized to take action through established Government machinery and to reach beyond the recommendations of the Tariff Commission which are limited by statute and practice.

It is worthy of note that the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC), composed of Belgium, France, West Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands, since 1953 has been in the process of establishing a Common Market in coal, iron ore, and steel. Also, it has followed a readaptation policy in many respects supporting the assistance program proposed in my legislation, but actually going much further than the United States would contemplate, since the ECSC will be a totally free market. The 7-year readaptation period is now concluded. During this period, the ECSC has extended $42.6 million in loans to help 110,000 employees in 195 production units owned by 127 companies to adapt to the new conditions of production and competition resulting from the establishment of the Common Market. The program is considered by the ECSC to be a great success.

Another aspect of a comprehensive trade policy would be the utilization of the machinery of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) to bring complaints against nations which permit substandard labor conditions to prevail in industries which compete in the domestic U.S. market. The International Labor Organization could well be used to investigate labor conditions and to set standards. Although this is not within the realm of legislative action, and I am informed that the administration is already taking steps in this direction, I believe that use of such a procedure is deserving of congressional support.

A comprehensive trade policy combined with a vigorously executed program of export promotion, as announced by the President on March 17, 1960, form the framework for the active pursuit of a policy of trade expansion. The success of a trade expansion policy, supported by economic aid to the less developed areas of the free world and by legislation to facilitate greater United States private investment in those areas, can become the determining factor in this Nation's ability to meet the challenges to its free world leadership, as well as its ability to solve many of its domestic economic problems.

Trade is the largest tangible measure of a nation's influence and sustained position of importance in the world. We can find this fact recorded in the ancient histories of Phoenicia and Crete and the more recent ones of Venice and the Hanseatic League, all of them either relatively small states or only cities, whose power spread over the world for centuries because of their trade, while the empires of Alexander, Ghengis Khan, and Charlemagne hardly survived the passing of their founders upon whose personal achievements they depended. During the past 2 centuries and extending to our times, Great Britain and her empire and commonwealth have symbolized the resiliency and power of a system based on trade, while the autarchic regimes on the continent of Europe rose and fell in quick succession. The creation of the European Economic Community is, in part, the result of common acknowledgment of this historic fact.

Chairman Khrushchev also realized this. In his historic pronouncement of November 1957, he stated:

> We declare war upon you—excuse me for using such an expression—in the peaceful field of trade. We declare a war we will win over the United States. The threat to the United States is not the ICBM, but in the field of peaceful production. We are relentless in this and it will prove the superiority of our system.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I realize that Senators are not too much interested in a speech on trade. However, I urge Senators that they had better become interested in trade, for two reasons. First, they will hear about it more and more from their home communities. They will be faced with the enormous problem of what is good for the United States, in terms of security and what is in the short-time individual interests of certain businesses in their particular communities whether they are producing gloves or ceramics or umbrellas or some types of textiles. I am confident that our course will be to go the national security way but also to safeguard our local interests to enable them to meet the situation. Therefore, in order to answer really the questions of constituents, I strongly recommend that Senators become more interested in these activities than is evidenced by the number of Senators who are listening to me today.

I am not put out about it. This has been the common experience in economic matters. However, I still say to Senators, what I have previously said, in a very considered way, that foreign trade will be one of the biggest issues in the coming campaign. Foreign economic policy may well be one of the biggest real issues of the 1960 campaign and of the 4 years succeeding, no matter who is the President.

We have learned the hard way that when a Hitler, a Khrushchev, and a Mussolini say they will do something—we had better listen.

Mr. Khrushchev said he will bury us. Where? How? By trade and economics, he says.

Mr. President, I am sorry to tell the Senate that, if we listen to the facts, he is on his way—and my speech today is to suggest action which will insure his defeat in the economic struggle.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HARTKE. I share with the Senator from New York the concern which he is evidencing today. I compliment him on the fine work he is doing and the vision which he is displaying in connection with this important matter in the field of international economic affairs.

I have had occasion to serve and work with the senior Senator from New York in regard to these matters in the NATO meetings. I have watched him display the highest of intelligence and the best of consideration on the problems which confront us. I agree with him that we are closer to the edge of the precipice than many people believe.

I join with the Senator from New York in his expressions in this field. I want him to know that I will listen; and not alone listen, but I will try to follow him in the way in which he leads, because, in my opinion, he is not alone a student, but a leader in this field.

Mr. JAVITS. I am deeply grateful to the Senator from Indiana for his very kind words. They are most encouraging.

I wish also to pay tribute to the Senator from Indiana for his generosity and his tremendous cooperation in the Economic Committee of the NATO parliamentarians, to which he graciously has referred, and of which I have the honor to act as chairman.

There are very few things which promise to help the American taxpayer as much as collaboration with European nations in carrying some of the responsibility for foreign aid, on which we have been working. That possibility is tremendously enhanced by their new-found economic strength, which they are experiencing in exactly the kind of economic cooperation which I am recommending to our country.

We do not even seem to be looking at them and taking the lesson which they are teaching us. In 1 year their internal trade has risen 40 percent, because they have found the secret of a market which reduces internal tariff barriers.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KUCHEL. I congratulate the Senator from New York for the leadership he takes in this important field. Our trade relations with free peoples, the trade policy of the people of the United States, as they are determined in the next session of Congress, will be, I do not doubt, the most important problem, as well as the most complex and involved one confronting the American people, short of the overriding problem of a just peace in the world.

But this problem represents an important part of the question of an honorable peace, as the distinguished senior Senator from New York has indicated. With him, I have listened to the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury discuss the very grave situation with respect to trade balances today. We have listened to the Secretary of State. We have heard the President. We have talked to our fellow citizens. Our trade policy, as it unfolds and as it is debated, not alone in the presidential campaign this fall, but thereafter, in the new Congress, will represent an area in which American industry, American labor, the American farmer—indeed, evey citizen in this land—will have a crucially vital interest.

Once again, my friend, the able Senator from New York, performs an important service by means of the comments he makes here today; and it will be in the interest of the security of the people of the United States to have the Members of Congress study and understand the question of American trade policy as it looms increasingly larger in importance on the horizon of the world's future.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from California.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the Senator from New York has brought up a question which it is very important that the public become well informed upon. Otherwise, they are likely to take shortsighted and one-sided views of it.

Possibly the hope of the world today lies in the expansion of international trade. That does not mean transplanting industry from one country to another. It means expanding the trade of the entire world, and thereby raising the living standards and other standards of all people, everywhere. If that is done, I believe the United States is smart enough to get its share of the business.

The Senator from New York has been calling this situation to our attention, as he is well qualified to do. But during the next 2 or 3 years it will be an increasingly important subject for discussion.

There are those who say, "We will go to another country, develop business there, get all we can out of it, and possibly ship back to the United States all our production, if we can."

That is not what we mean, because that would simply be supplanting our own production.

Another thing which I believe is important: Attention is constantly focused on the imbalance—it is called imbalance of trade—which the United States has not enjoyed for the last 2 or 3 years. This imbalance, as I understand it, is not due to the fact that we export less goods than we import. It is due to the fact that the United States in other areas sends money out of the country, with the result that the overall effect shows a deficit of some $3 billion a year. But that money is sent out in the form of tourist travel, assistance—both military assistance and other assistance—to other countries, and in many other ways, and does not represent an imbalance in the exchange of goods.

If I am incorrect as to that, I am sure the Senator from New York will correct me.

Mr. JAVITS. Not at all.

Mr. AIKEN. But we are doing very well. For instance, many of our machine tool manufacturers have been establishing branches in Western Europe, to take care of their trade throughout the rest of the world. I am gratified to note that last month was one of the best months for the export of machine tools that the manufacturers of this country have ever had. So to that extent this development represents an expansion of business everywhere, for them.

So, Mr. President, with that development we have no quarrel; in fact, we are highly gratified that that is so, and we hope it will be equally so in the production of other commodities, which can be produced here in America probably better and cheaper than in any other part of the world, today.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank my colleague very much. He is one of the most respected Members of this body, and it is tremendously gratifying to have him express appreciation of what I am trying to accomplish here and of what I have done for some time, now.

He is entirely correct in regard to the facts to which he has referred. We have roughly a $2,500 million to $3 billion surplus of exports over our imports. We use more than that because of the fact that our tourists are spending abroad almost $2 billion a year, and we spend about $3 billion on various aspects of our military responsibilities abroad, including the considerable part of their pay that our soldiers, sailors, and marines spend abroad. We have other items which are, perhaps, somewhat smaller in their compass. We have also the mutual security program. All of these represent the outflow of dollars, which results in giving us chronically, now, a rather varying imbalance in international payments.

But none of these begins to rate, in terms of the consequence to our own economy, with the vitally important foreign trade, and also, as a consequence, with the development of the free world and its knitting together by means of trade, which since time immemorial has been a nerve system of the world. When people trade with each other, there is a closeness and a relationship which always form the entering wedge for good relations and for peace.

In a word, I am trying to point out that what we lose in the pears, we get in the bananas. Today, we may have to do some shifting around. For instance, the Senator from Vermont, who has one of the great, luminous minds in the Congress in dealing with the field of agriculture, which is of tremendous interest in connection with foreign trade, knows that we may have to shift around as efficiency and production abroad change and as our efficiency changes and as our raw-material sources change. But, as the Senator from Vermont says, overall, and in view of the ingenuity and the machinery and the experience we have, we have no fear whatever of not doing infinitely better as the world does better.

But we must give ourselves some flexibility internally in making shifts to meet the needs, instead of being rigid, because if we are rigid, we are bound to die. One cannot continue for very long in an uneconomic situation.

The laws I shall propose in detail when we return, following the adjournment—at this time I am stating only the basic outline—will have to represent shifts to be made, just as shifts must be made when there is a transition from wartime production to peacetime production.

Mr. AIKEN. Of course, it is impossible to have normal progress in the world without making adjustments, and frequently people have to make adjustments. It may be that at times their own personal affairs will not, perhaps, be quite as advantageous as they were before they made the adjustments; but we have to consider the condition of the country as a whole and the welfare of all the people.

That is why we have to view these various proposals and trends from all sides, not just from our own position or perhaps from the position of one of our friends of whom we think a great deal.

I am satisfied that, barring major calamity—which I doubt—the commerce of the world is just beginning to expand.

Probably the greatest untapped wealth in the world is the potential consuming power of 2½ billion people who presently are trying to exist on incomes of $60 or $75 a year. Until that condition is changed, we cannot expect to have a tremendous increase in foreign trade. But the two go together: An increase of trade raises living standards; and a rise in living standards increases trade.

It is a tremendously intriguing subject. It is a subject in which it is so easy to get off on a tangent and go in the wrong direction. But it is a subject which is becoming increasingly important. I believe before the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act comes up again—in 1962, I think—we shall not only have to devote much attention to this subject, but also see to it that the American people, and particularly the American commercial and agricultural interests, understand it.

I am much gratified this year with the increase in exports of agricultural commodities, particularly those that were produced in surplus.

Last year we exported only about 2½ million bales of cotton. Up to 1 month ago, we had already exported 6½ million bales of cotton this year.

While we exported only 450 million bushels of wheat last year, we have almost reached that total this year so far. Possibly the figure may reach 500 million bushels.

Our exports of feed grains, of which some say we have a surplus, have increased very much.

We are exporting at the rate of 200 million bushels of corn a year. It was not so long ago that people were wondering what we were going to do with our corn.

It is gratifying to know of such exports, but there are hazards involved. The hazards are involved in the temptation to impose high trade barriers, not only on the part of people in this country, but on the part of people in other countries, too. That is why we have to work hard on this problem. That is why I compliment the Senator from New York, one of the ablest men with whom I have ever served, for bringing this subject to the forefront.

Mr. JAVITS. I am grateful to my colleague. He encourages me greatly.

I shall conclude very shortly, because my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] is waiting to be recognized.

Therein lies the reason for the rapid rate of Soviet bloc trade expansion which nearly doubled trade with the free world from $3.6 billion in 1954 to $6.9 billion in 1958. During this same period, U.S. trade, which is of course on a much larger scale, increased by only one-third, from $23 billion in 1954 to $30 billion in 1958. Of even greater significance, however, is the fact that during this same period, the Soviet bloc share of free world trade increased from 2.3 percent to 3.5 percent—a 52-percent gain in the percentage share of free world trade—while the U.S. share remained stable at somewhat less than 16 percent.

It must be realized that the United States was passing through a period of economic recession during both of those years and that during the past decade the U.S. share of free world foreign trade averaged out at nearly 17 percent. Also, 1959 estimates indicate that although Soviet bloc trade with the free world increased again, its percentage share did not increase because total free world trade rose from $197 billion in 1958 to $208 billion in 1959, in its recovery from the recession.

So the Russians are closing the gap, even though the gap is wide, because, whereas the Russians do only 3 to 4 percent of the world's trade, we have about 16 or 17 percent of the world's trade.

Our trade amounts to about $30 billion or more a year. The exact figure for this year is $33½ billion.

If the Soviet bloc, however, resumes the steady rate of increase in its percentage share of world trade which held true for the 5 years 1954 through 1958, it could equal the present U.S. share of 17 percent by 1975. It is in this light that we must view the large proportion of world trade we now hold; in the relatively near future an equally large proportion could be at the disposal of the monolithic political purposes of the Soviet bloc. Even now, with only a 3.5-percent share of world trade in Soviet hands, Finland, Iceland, and the United Arab Republic, which depend on Soviet markets for more than 35 percent of their exports, are experiencing the pressures and dangers inherent in this dependence. Already, in 1958, Iran, Turkey, and Uruguay found between 21 and 26 percent of their export markets in the Soviet bloc, as compared with 10 to 18 percent in 1954.

When I mention Iran and Turkey, I point out the connection between the strategic thrust of the Soviet Union and its trade thrust.

Malaya's dependence increased from 1.6 percent to 10 percent and Greece's from 7 percent to 16 percent. As more countries grow increasingly dependent on the Soviet bloc for large parts of their trade, the pressures now being felt by only a few will be extended to the others and become more brutal and bold because there will be no turning back from them.

In order to evaluate the significance of trade to U.S. foreign policy, we can most simply examine it in terms of magnitude and in terms of the leverage it provides. The $35 billion involved in U.S. exports and imports this year means that about 17 percent of free-world trade will pass directly through our hands. It represents quantitatively our second largest commitment to international affairs, being only slightly less than our defense expenditures and nine times greater than the appropriations for foreign military and economic aid.

Furthermore, it does not represent Government expenditures, but, for the greatest part, private economic expenditures. Seven percent of our gross national product is involved—3 percent in imports and 4 percent in exports. The importance of these percentages to our domestic economy will be discussed later, after I give some indication of their impact on other free-world nations.

In 1959, U.S. imports of 27 products from the 20 other American Republics subject to tariff or quota restrictions provided dollar exchange to them three times greater than U.S. Government credits and 10 times greater than U.S. Government grants to them. Total U.S. imports from these countries were more than twice as large. It is a matter of prime importance to note that even a modest increase in the two-way trade with Latin America would mean more dollar income for them than our grant-aid programs. This would enhance its effectiveness, especially in those cases where small industries employing indigenous labor and little capital could find an increasing and meaningful stake in the U.S. market.

When we consider the nations of Africa and the other American Republics, we should consider the tremendously preponderant influence on their economy of trade with the United States, and the indispensable character of that trade—not only to them, but to the United States, because we get indispensable raw materials from them. It is true, as the Senator from Vermont has just noted, there is an enormous amount of discrimination and restriction which exists in other countries of the world. We are fighting against it, and we should; but it does not reduce the considerable importance of trade to us and to the peace hopes of the world in terms of trade.

In finding markets for the products of these developing and less developed nations, we must have the cooperation of the industrialized countries of the free world. The rapidly expanding markets of Europe are of the greatest importance to the producers in the less developed areas of the free world. As the United States may open new markets to these areas, so must Europe.

But even with the industrialized countries the United States enjoys a preponderant trade leverage. In 1959, Japanese exports to the United States alone, its largest market, represented 3 percent of the Japanese gross national product. So did their imports from the United States. In these terms United States-Japanese trade is 12 times as important to the Japanese economy as it is to ours. For this very reason, the implications of United States-Japanese trade take on vast importance to our foreign policy.

Exports to the United States by the countries of the European Economic Community—EEC—represent 1.7 percent of their gross national product—more than 3 times greater than the relative importance which U.S. imports from them have to our gross national product. Furthermore, while imports by the EEC members from the rest of the world increased by less than 20 percent during the first quarter of this year, compared to the same period in 1959, their imports from the United States rose by 54 percent, indicating in large part a great need for the goods which we produce. Thus, trade is the measure of this Nation's leverage in world affairs. It represents the cooperation with the United States, of all those who sell to us and buy from us.

Combined with foreign aid and investment, it is the basic fabric upon which the design of U.S. foreign policy is woven. The pattern of our diplomacy and our other international programs would disintegrate, if it were not stitched into the tough material of trade, aid, and investment. More than that: this material and the patterns woven into it are both important parts of the image and the substance of America in the world today.

In addition, the domestic economic importance of expanding international trade is rapidly increasing. The recessions which we have experienced since the Second World War have been to a large extent capital goods recessions. This was especially the case in 1957–58. Had we been able to maintain our exports of machinery during this period, instead of suffering a 10-percent decline of $400 million, which persisted up to September 1959, some of the edge could have been taken off the recession. We must constantly expand our oversea markets, especially for capital goods. The acceptable development of vast sectors of the developing world raises both the needs and the purchasing power of these areas.

Rising living standards offer great market potentials. For instance, we find that the United Kingdom and West Germany, with annual per capita incomes of $958 and $742, respectively, make annual per capita purchases of $21 and $18 from the United States. India and Pakistan, however, with per capita incomes of $61 and $52, make per capita purchases of only $1.10 and $1.30 from the United States. In all four of these countries, per capita imports were between 1.8 percent and 2.5 percent of per capita income.

The possibilities offered by the markets in the developing areas, once living standards have risen substantially, really stagger the imagination—especially when one considers that the population of India and Pakistan alone is nearly five times as large as that of the United Kingdom and West Germany. In order to obtain these markets, however, we must now establish trade in them. To do so, we must import from these developing nations so that they may purchase more of our products and acquire a need and a taste for the items which we can sell to them.

On the import side, our expanding economy will depend increasingly on our ability to import. Even now there is a long list of items, mostly primary products from nations in the less developed areas of the free world, for the procurement of which we depend almost entirely on imports. For the 5 years, 1954 through 1958, we imported 100 percent of our supplies of natural rubber, jute, raw silk, corundum, industrial and other diamonds, and various other minerals, from the free world nations of Africa, Asia, and Latin America. During the same period we imported between 75 percent and 99 percent of our supplies of manganese, chromium, bauxite, nickel, tin, and cobalt from these areas, Europe, Canada, and Oceania. In 1958, the items listed totaled nearly $1.3 billion. Studies indicate that from now on imports of such materials will have to increase at a rate at least twice as fast as the rate of increase of U.S. production. It is estimated that even now a full half of the jobs in our economy depend on the U.S. capacity to import both raw materials and other goods. We must preserve our ability to buy. We cannot afford to let these suppliers depend on the Communist block, and we must develop markets in them now so that we will be able to buy from them in the future.

Mr. President, the American industrial machine would be absolutely stopped if we could not depend on these imports of raw materials.

So I urge my colleagues to give careful attention to this problem. It involves the broadest kind of national interest. It will be up to every Member in this body to decide whether he is going to support the national interest or support small, private interests. I know what the result of the latter would be, but I think Members of this body had better do their homework and get the answers, themselves.

Finally, Mr. President, this is not going to wait until the renewal of the reciprocal trade agreements program. It will be pressing in on us every day, as every Senator will see from the enormous number of bills on the calendar for special concessions and special protection.

I think we must have a comprehensive policy, a policy which will accommodate the necessity for change and the necessity for adjustment in our own country without absolutely destroying our international position both in terms of trade and in terms of peace leadership. For that reason I have laid out the lines of the proposed legislation. I shall introduce the bill when we return from the recess.

SUMMARY OF ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE REPUBLICAN-CREATED COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the subject of civil rights is basic and vital, not only in this Nation but also throughout the world. It is a subject which has been before this body at length and on numerous occasions.

It is a subject which is prominent in the history of the Republican Party—indeed, it might be said that the Republican Party came into being because of a great civil rights issue.

In this connection, I invite attention to a report on the accomplishments of the Federal Civil Rights Commission by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] on the recent record of the Republican Party, its abiding interest in civil rights and in seeing that the civil rights of all Americans are protected; and I ask unanimous consent that this report be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REPUBLICAN-CREATED COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS—A SUMMARY OF ITS ACCOMPLISHMENTS

(By U.S. Senator CLIFFORD P. CASE, of New Jersey)

Perhaps the most dramatic and far-reaching legislative accomplishment of this Republican administration was the enactment, for the first time in 82 years, of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, followed by the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

In 1957, the then Attorney General Herbert Brownell, Jr., representing the President, made a request to the Congress for a full-scale public study regarding the denial of the right to vote and other deprivations of equal protection of the laws because of race, color, religion or national origin which allegedly were being perpetrated against certain minority groups in this country.

The Republican administration asked for a "full-scale public study," declaring that it should be objective and free from partisanship, broad, and at the same time, thorough. These were the reasons that the administration felt a bipartisan Commission, independent of the Congress, could best, fairly, and objectively appraise the civil rights situation as it exists in the United States. In response to this request, Congress established the Commission on Civil Rights as a part of the first civil rights act passed since 1875. On September 9, 1957, the President saw his wishes come to fruition when he signed the civil rights bill.

THE CONTENTS OF THE ACT

Specifically, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 directed the Commission to (1) investigate allegations in writing under oath or affirmation that certain citizens of the United States are being deprived of the right to vote and to have that vote counted by reason of their color, race, religion, or national origin; (2) study and collect information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the law under the Constitution; (3) appraise the laws and policies of the Federal Government with respect to equal protection of the laws under the Constitution.

STAFFING THE COMMISSION

On November 7, 1957, the President nominated the following members of the Commission: Stanley Reed, retired Supreme Court Justice, Chairman; John A. Hannah, president of Michigan State University; John S. Battle, former Governor of Virginia; the Reverend Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of the University of Notre Dame; Robert G. Storey, dean of the Southern Methodist University Law School; and Assistant Secretary of Labor J. Ernest Wilkins. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Justice Reed resigned. The President then nominated Dr. Hannah to be Chairman and Doyle E. Carlton, former Governor of Florida, to be the sixth member of the Commission.

The Senate confirmed the nominations on March 4, 1958. On February 18, 1958, the President nominated Gordon M. Tiffany, former attorney general of New Hampshire, to be Staff Director of the Commission. This nomination was not confirmed by the Senate until May 14, and it was not until this time that the Commission could effectively proceed with its task.

Thus, with 16 months remaining before its report was due to be presented to the President and the Congress, the Commission went about its job of making findings of fact and recommendations to the President and Congress.

On January 19, 1959, J. Ernest Wilkins died, and the President nominated Dean George M. Johnson, a Commission staff member, to replace Mr. Wilkins as a member of the Commission. The Senate confirmed Dean Johnson's nomination on June 4, 1959.

THE COMMISSION REPORT

On September 9, 1959, the Commission's first report was presented to the President and the Members of the Congress. Of the 14 recommendations made, 13 were unanimous. Only one of the six Commissioner's dissented on the 14th recommendation.

The patience and care of the President in selecting the members of this Commission to deal with the very delicate problem of civil rights was rewarded by the report and by the recommendations which these members so carefully formulated.

Perhaps the most important recommendation made was the voting registrar proposal which would deal with cases of discrimination against any citizen because of race, color, creed, or national origin in exercising his franchise.

Shortly after the report was presented, the Congress, just prior to its adjournment and at the request of the President, extended the life of the Commission for another 2 years. Both the administration and the Congress recognized the important contributions being made by the Commission in the field of civil rights, and thus endorsed its work.

The recommendation for voting registrars soon captured the interest of many Members of Congress and of the administration. Hearings were held in early January 1960 on the Commission's proposals. At the same time, the administration, on the basis of the Commission's findings regarding discrimination in voting, proposed the "voting referee plan."

After 2 months of debate by Congress, the administration's referee plan was adopted and signed into law by the President this spring. The Commission had also urged the preservation of voting records, which became a provision in the 1960 Civil Rights Act signed by the President. Other recommendations made by the Commission which did not require legislation have been considered and initiated by Government agencies.

COMMISSION STUDIES VOTING, HOUSING, EDUCATION, JUSTICE, AND EMPLOYMENT

Initially, the Commission, because of the limits of time, only considered civil rights activities in three areas. These were voting, housing, and education. Although recommendations were made in all three fields, one of the Commission's most important accomplishments so far concerns education. Two conferences have been held, one in 1959 in Nashville, Tenn., and another in 1960 in Gatlinburg, Tenn., where public officials from States which had proceeded with desegregation of their schools appeared before the Commission, and met together to discuss their common problems.

These were the first such conferences held under Federal sponsorship. Generally, the educators attending the conferences found it helpful to exchange views and share their experience in dealing with similar problems.

The Commission recently announced that it has decided to expand its field of inquiry into two additional subject areas. These are public employment and the administration of justice. These studies are just beginning and the Commission hopes to appraise civil rights in these areas, thus making a positive contribution through findings and recommendations.

The Commission's next report is due on September 9, 1961. This report will include findings and recommendations in the fields of voting, housing, education, administration of justice, and public employment.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG, JULY 1, 2, AND 3

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, 97 years ago today the Battle of Gettysburg was raging in all its full and terrible violence. Americans from every part of the Nation were on the field that day to shape history, and America would never be the same again, but from that crucible would go forward to become a great Union of free men. We no longer think of those men as northerners or southerners but only as Americans, and we are proud of every one of them, for theirs was the strength and dedication that we hope will endure in all generations of Americans.

If ever there was a symbol of America it is the Gettysburg battlefield. Yet today that symbol is in great danger of being tarnished by the negligence and indifference of Congress and the Nation. Funds are needed to preserve and maintain the battlefield, and they are needed now. While some private organizations are making a laudable effort to arouse interest in this problem and to collect money, I submit that this is properly the responsibility of the Federal Government, and on this day I hope we will acknowledge and face up to this responsibility.

New York had more men on the battlefield those three historic July days than any other State. It was a New York general, General Sickles, who lost his leg there and later became the Congressman who first introduced legislation to make Gettysburg a national military park. As a Senator from New York 97 years later I wish to serve notice to the Congress and to the people that I shall do everything within my power to see to it that Gettysburg is saved for all time. I shall press for whatever Federal funds are necessary to do the job properly and in its entirety, for this project should not be undertaken piecemeal or half-heartedly. I seek the support of every Senator and Representative in this undertaking. Let us appropriate the funds and enact the legislation which will make the field of Gettysburg truly a national shrine for ourselves and our children.

One of the chief obstacles to the proper preservation and visual realization of the historic battlefield of Gettysburg is the interspersion of private lands among federally owned park lands. These private lands are threatened with or may even be in the process of development. Many of the scenes of significant fighting and heroic actions are still privately owned. Monuments and memorials to gallant regiments stand in the dooryards of motels and souvenir stands. Automobile junkyards occupy the sites from which hardy artillerymen poured forth their volleys of shell and canister. The land across which Early's Confederate division made its decisive attack on the first day still looks much as it did in July 1863, but it is about to be sold and will undoubtedly be subdivided and soon covered with houses and shops, completely destroying the scene where Gen. John B. Gordon, C.S.A., dismounted to offer a drink from his canteen to the seriously wounded Gen. Francis Barlow, youthful 1st Division commander of the Union XI Corps, and to see that he was given medical care. In the field of Pickett's charge, surely an epic in the military history of the whole world, are isolated private tracts surrounded by federally owned land. Other such inholdings are located near the wheatfield where the incredible Sickles lost his leg and aroused a mighty controversy, and they dot the fields of the first day's fight as well. Some such tracts have already sprouted undesirable and distracting developments. Others could do so at any time. If a national military park is to fulfill its dual purposes of inspiration and education, it must help the visitor visualize the scenes of heroism and sacrifice which it commemorates and make those scenes vivid in his mind. It cannot do this if he is constantly distracted by glaring modern intrusions which so alter the scene that it cannot be recaptured. In order to prevent such destruction at Gettysburg, the National Park Service estimates that, for a properly rounded out park adequately protecting the original historic battlefield scene, approximately $2,750,000 will be required at today's prices. Approximately 600 acres are involved. This would eliminate the inholdings in areas already largely federally owned, protect the important scenes of the first day's battle, provide buffer strips to keep undesirable commercial developments a minimum distance from important monuments and buildings, and include rights-of-way for the roads and trails necessary to permit the visitor to reach the specific sites which he wishes to see. Significantly, this acreage is far less than that originally visualized by the Commission which was appointed to establish the area as a national military park in 1896. These men, many of them veterans who had fought at Gettysburg, planned for the optimum in protection for the historic field. Only a portion of their program has been carried out through the succeeding years, and the present plans of the National Park Service represent merely a basic minimum that must be acquired if this scene of one of the world's decisive battles is to be preserved.

The preservation of the field of the first day's fighting at Gettysburg presents one of the most difficult problems. The climactic event was the attack of Early's Confederate division along the Harrisburg road in the afternoon. Here the Union line was finally outflanked and driven back across the lands of the County Poor Farm, through the town itself to positions on Cemetery Hill. It was during this phase of the fighting that some of the most dramatic events of the day took place. The wounding of the youthful Barlow and his succor by General Gordon has already been mentioned. The two men remained fast friends. It was on these fields also that the body of a Union soldier clutching a photograph of a group of small children was found by burial parties. Since there was no other means of identifying the man, the photograph was published throughout the North until the family was located. Public reaction to the poignant search was such that an orphanage was established at Gettysburg with gifts sent in by individuals who had been touched by the story.

This land is still the Adams County Poor Farm, and it has changed little from its appearance in 1863. Recently, however, it has proved uneconomical for the county to operate, and the land is to be sold. According to law, it must go to the highest bidder. The county can dispose of it in no other way. It has no authority to donate it to the Federal Government. In an effort to cooperate, the county authorities have delayed selling the property for 2 years in order to allow the United States to obtain the land. Thus far, however, the National Park Service has been specifically forbidden by Congress to purchase this property.

THE SEATO ALLIANCE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the SEATO alliance is a vital force in the defense of Asia and the United States. It is important that the American people have a better understanding of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

Mr. Robert E. Lee, Washington correspondent of the St. Paul Pioneer Press Washington Bureau, has written a series of articles evaluating and analyzing the strengths and weaknesses of SEATO. He has traveled throughout the area. He has studied the problems of the eight-nation organization and has given us a splendid report of his findings. We are indebted to Mr. Lee for his series of thoughtful, constructive, and informative articles. We in Minnesota are proud of Mr. Lee, both as a talented journalist and a perceptive observer.

I ask unanimous consent to have the seven articles printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EIGHT NATIONS JOIN FOR DEFENSE—SEATO MAKES EAST MEET WEST

(By Robert E. Lee)

BANGKOK, THAILAND.—In a modest three-story building next door to a boxing arena here, the Occident and the Orient are trying to rewrite history and prove that Kipling was wrong.

This is the story of SEATO, born in 1954 in the blood of Dienbienphu as Western colonialism died in Asia, and Communist China turned hungrily to the southern part of the continent.

SEATO, an eight-nation alliance with headquarters exactly half way around the world from New York, is about as well known in the Western Hemisphere as the practice of Buddhism. Yet it was conceived by the late John Foster Dulles as a frontline bastion against aggression from Red China. And its military strength is rooted mainly in the aircraft carriers, jet fighters and GI's of the United States; SEATO's civil activities, moreover, are largely products of the U.S. foreign aid program.

In this sense, SEATO is an American show. But in another, which is emphatically underscored by our military and diplomatic officials on the spot, SEATO is a collective organization with each member wielding an equal one-eighth influence. This is a pact mutually sought, mutually respected and mutually administered.

It is, in fact, American officials insist, a continual meeting of East and West to sharpen their common defenses against the military and political challenges of communism, Chinese style.

The West is the three traditional allies, the United States, Britain and France. The East is Australia and New Zealand plus the small Asian countries of Thailand, Pakistan and the Philippines.

If it seems strange that a treaty to defend southeast Asia includes only three small countries of southeast Asia. This is a strange treaty and a strange part of the world. Three other states under SEATO's protective umbrella—the former French Indochinese colonies of Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia—are barred from joining by the armistice ending the war between France and the Communist Vietminh for their control. India, Burma, Malaya, and Indonesia are neutralist, leaning gradually toward anti-communism but still fearing the Red Chinese. Somewhat ironically, the only big threat so far has been aimed at nonmember Laos.

Thus SEATO represents an unbalanced team to resist Communist aggression against other nations and buy time for U.S. counter-attack if aggression comes.

The potential aggressors, the Chinese Communists, call it a paper tiger. Its secretary general, Pote Sarasin, an able, westernized Thai diplomat, calls it a new and successful concept in collective security. He says it works and is ready to move defensively with swiftness and determination.

The term "collective" is everywhere apparent in its operations. There is careful distributions of rank and responsibility among all eight member nations. Pote's deputy is a shrewd Australian civil servant; the top military planner is a British brigadier; the head of the military forces is the commander in chief of the U.S. land, sea, and air forces in the Pacific.

Unlike its European counterpart, NATO, the southeast Asia alliance has no armed forces assigned to it. Its military people are planners in the strictest sense of the word but this, roughly, is what they could call on:

Three U.S. Army divisions, based in Korea and Hawaii, totaling 67,000 troops. Some troops can be transported by air.

Two U.S. air forces, the Japan-based 5th and the Philippines-based 13th, with 650 tactical aircraft, many armed with nuclear weapons.

Two U.S. Navy fleets, the 1st in Hawaii supporting the 7th in the western Pacific, with 650 ships and 1,800 planes, many with nuclear weapons.

Strong British Fleet elements based at Singapore.

Highly trained land, sea, and air forces in Australia and New Zealand.

Less well-trained and less well-equipped but nonetheless competent land, sea, and air forces in Thailand, Pakistan, and the Philippines.

Besides these SEATO nation forces, SEATO looks to the military elements of Laos and South Vietnam to hold the line if an attack should be aimed to the eastward of Thailand, and to the neutralist countries to resist if they are attacked.

Aggression in one of the neutral states of the area would present a ticklish problem to SEATO military chiefs. One officer put it this way: "We would hope that the country under attack would ask us to come in and defend it. If it didn't, we would do what we could to convince it that SEATO's military forces were needed to stop the Chinese Communists from overruning the whole area."

Another delicate issue is the use of nuclear weapons, which the Asian countries fear and which would probably be inoperable anyway if aggression were mounted on a limited war basis. Nuclear bombs are at the ready less than an hour away in the Philippines. But SEATO expects that the mainland Chinese and their Vietnam allies would step up the bamboo war in the jungles of Indochina rather than launch the kind of full-scale attack that would call for nuclear retaliation.

SOUTHEAST ASIA LIKENED TO THE STORY OF ANTI-RED SCHOOLHOUSE

(By Robert E. Lee)

BANGKOK, THAILAND.—The Southeast Asia Treaty Organization is primarily a military defense alliance against Communist aggression, but it also has a soul.

SEATO officials recognize they're working to resist not only territorial expansion but also a Communist challenge in another area. An American observer here has aptly termed this "the story of the anti-Red schoolhouse."

This civil side of SEATO is expressed in terms of increased opportunities and improved living conditions for the people of the area. Actually, it's still on a small scale and confined largely to Thailand. Potentially, it's as great a weapon against communism as the Armed Forces of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the other treaty states.

SEATO's civil works program has not only real worth but an immeasurable showcase value. The program consists of an advanced engineering school for the three Asiatic partners, Thailand, Pakistan, and the Philippines; a vocational teacher-training program designed to put technical know-how into the hands of mechanics in rural communities of the Asiatic partners; a cholera research project, and a Thailand-Pakistan-Philippines meteorological and communications study for improved civil aviation.

Several other SEATO partners have made contributions to all four projects, in addition to Thailand which most benefits. But essentially they are supported by U.S. foreign aid funds as a sort of gift to SEATO. The two Thailand schools, both in Bangkok, are operated under contract by the University of Colorado and the University of Hawaii, respectively.

The overall educational program is the joint answer of SEATO and the United States to the appeal of the Asian partners for something in return for their participation in the defense pact. It does not, nor is it intended to, serve as a substitute for any part of the foreign aid the three countries receive from us under bilateral mutual security agreements. It is, in effect, a bonus for signing up with SEATO—in addition to an effort to meet some of the desperate needs of these underdeveloped countries.

The graduate engineering school, which opened last year with 18 students in Thai-donated buildings on the campus of Choulalongkorn University here, has a budget of $850,000 for the first 3 years of operation. This is the same amount as SEATO's annual military budget. Study is concentrated on hydraulic engineering at the moment, in deference to the monsoon flood problems of the area and the need to develop additional water resources.

The Thailand skilled labor school, in a suburban Bangkok jungle, will graduate 1,700 Thais qualified to teach their rural countrymen the finer points of automobile engine maintenance and repair, welding, electricity, radio repair, carpentry, and structural construction.

Most of the cholera research project is centered in East Pakistan, although there is a laboratory here. The weather and communications work is scattered among the three countries involved.

NEUTRALS TURNING AGAINST COMMIES—RED CHINA'S INCURSIONS AID SEATO

(By Robert E. Lee)

BANGKOK, THAILAND.—Despite some serious built-in weaknesses, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization is shaping up as a dependable deterrent to Communist aggression in the area. Ironically, a big push toward success has come from SEATO's primary potential enemy, Communist China.

The winning of acceptance from the neutralist countries which predominate in the area has been a slow process. Many questions about the SEATO alliance are still raised in such places as India, Burma, and Indonesia. But, as one leading Western diplomat here puts it, "SEATO isn't a dirty word anymore in the neutral countries."

It's quite evident that Red China's own tactics have helped in large measure to give SEATO a more respectable aspect. The Chinese Communists' adventures in Tibet and on the Indian border have served to spotlight their aggressiveness and give the neutrals pause for reflection.

Says Pote Sarasin, the Thai career diplomat who is SEATO's secretary-general: "It has become quite clear everywhere in this area that Communist China is not to be trusted." The able U.S. Ambassador to Thailand, U. Alexis Johnson, also feels that the Red Chinese themselves are helping nonmember Asian countries understand SEATO's objective.

Simply stated, this is deterrence of overt Communist aggression, prevention of subversive infiltration and military delaying tactics for the 24- to 48-hour period which would be required to bring the heavy air, sea and land power of the United States and Britain to bear if an attack were launched anywhere in the area.

There's no question in the minds of Sarasin, Johnson and Adm. Harry D. Felt, who commands both the U.S. forces in the Pacific and SEATO forces when assigned by the member countries, that the alliance is prepared to move swiftly and effectively if needed. Military readiness was demonstrated—at least to their satisfaction—last year when a border crisis in Laos threatened to erupt into a new Korea. The war plans that were prepared to meet the Laotian situation also convinced many doubters that SEATO is far more than the "paper tiger" Communist China sneeringly calls it.

But SEATO has built something else that may be even more effective, according to what little testimony it is possible for a reporter to take in the short space of a week. This is the sense of partnership, of belonging, that the three Asian members of the alliance are beginning to feel.

It is apparent in the enthusiasm with which Thailand, Pakistan, and the Philippines flung their tiny navies into an exercise just completed in the South China Sea and Gulf of Siam. It is apparent in the day-to-day operations at SEATO headquarters here in Bangkok. It will be apparent to anyone who observes the annual meetings of the SEATO military chiefs and SEATO council of ministers in Washington later this month.

Under Ambassador Johnson's leadership, every American official, civilian or military, who has anything to do with SEATO is almost ridiculously cautious about emphasizing the partnership line.

"Our vote on the board of directors carries no more weight than does Pakistan's or Thailand's," they keep telling themselves and their Asian counterpart officers. This, of course, is silly but it seems to be convincing the Asians.

Behind the careful nurturing of the equal partnership concept is the ugly specter of colonialism. Nearly all the countries in southeast Asia, including those both in and out of the SEATO alliance, have felt the heavy boot of the 19th century European empire builder. Thailand is a glaring exception. The memory of the French in the Indochinese States now called Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia, of the Dutch in Indonesia and of the British practically everywhere else in the area is still very real. It is not a pleasant chapter in history.

In contrast, our own paternalistic experience in the Philippines in the early part of this century did not leave deep scars. In fact, the redemption in 1946 of the U.S. pledge of Philippine independence built up almost as much good will for us in the former colonies as the enormous outpouring of foreign aid funds.

The United States is keenly aware that it cannot appear to be stepping in where the French, the Dutch, and the British stepped—or were driven—out. Convincing the young and highly nationalistic countries of the area that our intentions are honorable is a large order and one that will be filled only slowly. Happily, though, the problem is recognized.

RIPE FOR RED INFLUENCE—SOUTHEAST ASIA IS LAND OF MISERY

(By Robert E. Lee)

BANGKOK, THAILAND.—The people of southeast Asia, like the tribes of Biblical Israel, have many sorrows. Besides the circumstance of geography, sorrow is about all the people of southeast Asia have in common.

There is shocking poverty, widespread illiteracy, lack of economic development and no democratic political tradition. There are unhappy memories of European colonialism and mistrust of the white man in many of the new republics of the area. There are greatly dissimilar cultural institutions, long histories of interregional warfare and passionate new nationalisms which concentrate attention on long-needed local reform.

These are only some of the problems confronting officials trying to build a strong Southeast Asia Treaty Organization to deter and resist possible Communist aggression. Even getting the new states of the area to recognize Communist China as a major threat to their security is a problem. Certainly the people in the rice paddies all over this part of the world couldn't care less.

OBSTACLES NOTED

Officials of the United States and other SEATO alliance nations understand the monumental obstacles. And they see the need for a new kind of diplomacy, far different from that practiced with some assurance in Western Europe for several decades. This is one reason SEATO's secretary-general ever since its creation in 1954 has been Pote Sarasin, a Thai diplomat who should know the area and its characteristics if anybody does.

For example, Pote told this reporter the other day that it will take at least another generation to dispel bitter memories of the colonialism which exploited virtually every country in the area but his own. He said this generation's political leaders in India, Indonesia, Indochina and elsewhere can never forget.

The area which the United States, Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Thailand have allied themselves to protect includes many lands—giving rise to many other problems. If Burma or Indonesia—both neutralist—were attacked, for example, the national government would have to be convinced that SEATO's aid should be sought.

CHOU MAKES PITCH

The problem is somewhat different in Laos and Vietnam, where the United States and other SEATO countries are on the spot with advisers and where SEATO's defensive umbrella would be welcomed in case the guerrilla skirmishing of North Vietnamese Communists erupted into real warfare.

But it is something else again in the third newly independent state of Indochina, Cambodia. Chou En-lai, the Red Chinese premier, is making a big pitch to win the neutralist Cambodians to the other side with economic aid which is far less than what Uncle Sam has poured in but which is broadly advertised in the country.

SEATO officials insist the alliance doesn't suffer because Laos and South Vietnam are prevented by a 1954 treaty from joining up—as is Cambodia. But they admit it would acquire a big morale boost if the anti-Communist states of Indochina and others were members.

No one on the spot here will venture a guess when or whether SEATO will have new partners. If, for example, Burma and Cambodia, flanking Thailand on the east and west, were to abandon neutralism and join the alliance it would be something of a miracle. For centuries the Thais have been fighting with both. Even now, the world court at The Hague is considering a Thai-Cambodia border dispute, involving a Buddhist temple. Cambodia claims it because it is on her side of the ill-defined border. Thailand insists the temple is on her side of the border but that even if it isn't the temple is hers because the Thais, who were once slaves of the Cambodians, built it.

Add to this kind of quarreling the geographical difficulties of defending an area sprawling over the southeastern part of the continent and the seas below, and the absence of any real transportation or communications systems, and the problems become obvious. The people of the various nations SEATO is designed to protect hardly know one another save for having met at a war every century or so.

A telegram sent from Bangkok to Rangoon, a mere 300 miles west, goes via London and takes 2 days—if the sender is lucky. A telegram to Saigon, 400 miles to the east, goes through Paris and takes the same time. As a regional agency, SEATO still must contend with the lingering aftereffects of the British in Burma and the French in Indochina.

Moreover, the economies of the countries, heavily dependent upon rice with rubber, minerals and lumber in some countries, are competitive—sometimes aggressively so. This does not make for regional friendship, even against a common potential enemy.

Construction of a strong defensive alliance is slow going. The pessimists still are not convinced. But the optimists, though cautious, insist that it can be done and that the right steps are being taken to overcome the natural obstacles and the deep-seated national animosities.

ADVISERS ACTIVE—UNITED STATES PLAYS ROLE IN VIETNAM WAR

(By Robert E. Lee)

SAIGON, SOUTH VIETNAM.—The U.S. military is deeply involved here in the only hot war against communism now being fought anywhere in the world.

Our involvement, as U.S. Army and Air Force officers on the scene are careful to stress, is advisory. This means that no U.S. troops are in action against the North Vietnam forces of Communist Boss Ho Chi Minh. The terms of an armistice that was supposed to end the war in 1954 specifically prohibit intervention from outside.

But without the military equipment supplied by the United States and the instruction in its use supplied by our officers, the South Vietnamese people would be overrun by the Red guerrilla troops which prowl the country. There are about 300 officers and men and an equal number of U.S. civilians.

The armistice did end the full-scale pitched battles between the Vietminh of the north and the French-South Vietnam forces. The fall of Dien Bien Phu brought the formal close of hostilities, along with the end of France's century-long domination in all Indochina and her departure from the continent of Asia. With the armistice came an international control commission of Canadian, Polish, and Indian officers to oversee the cease-fire agreement.

WAR GOES ON

In fact, though, what the Commission sees is an unbroken continuation of guerrilla warfare which waxes and wanes in intensity. The fighting now is perhaps as heavy as it has been during the 6 years of uneasy peace between the north and south halves of this country divided by the 17th parallel.

The skirmishing, south of the parallel, is the one continuing point of contact on the globe between Communist and anti-Communist troops. It is localized and small scale, but unlike the isolated Indian-Chinese border episodes and occasional artillery shelling in the Formosa Straits, it never ceases.

That the South Vietnamese are putting up a good fight against the Communists can be attributed to the twin factors of U.S. assistance in equipment and training and the leadership of President Ngo Dinh Diem, whom many people in this part of the world consider the best politician in southeast Asia. Americans on the scene call him a benevolent military dictator.

Diem has brought half-savage boys out of the hills, delivered them into the hands of the U.S. officers for instruction in everything from the use of latrines to the handling of rifles and operation of jeeps, and somehow has welded a fighting force that is holding its own against the Communist guerrillas.

While going through their 16 weeks' basic training at the hands of the U.S. "advisers" the soldiers get a dose of political education from Diem's army propagandists. U.S. officers here say the propaganda courses are not unlike the indoctrination and education courses taught in our own army.

Besides building up his military with the aid of U.S. dollars and instruction, Diem is fighting the Communists by trying to deprive the guerrilla bands of sustenance as they roam the country far to the south of their own support bases. The chief weapon in this campaign is the establishment of a number of "agrovilles," or farm communities which bring families with their agricultural produce to a central place for joint protection.

The first of these was opened a couple of weeks ago. Both Diem's forces and the Communists in effect contend for the backing of the people—practically all of whom are farmers—because the elementary logistics system of the opposing troops requires their living off the land. Farm families widely scattered through the countryside are easy prey to the Red guerrillas; collected in agrovilles they presumably can deny them food and starve them out.

The agroville idea also is designed to cut down on Communist subversive activities in South Vietnam—one of the most pressing problems faced by the U.S.-backed Diem forces.

When this reporter talked to them early in May, U.S. Army officers in Saigon had seen no evidence of guerrilla activity or other hostilities in the city. Their families were under no special orders to stay indoors during the evening and there were no reports of shooting. Most officers who had been out with the Vietnamese, however, had seen action at first hand in their advisory capacities.

Americans here tend to regard Diem's iron-fisted administration policies as a necessary evil in a country which became independent only 6 years ago.

The press is controlled—to the extent of a censorship which frequently produces empty spaces on the front pages.

Local reporters are afraid to ask Diem and other Government officials embarrassing questions—to the extent that a U.S. information officer asked some American correspondents to conduct a seminar in press conference tactics.

ANSWER AWAITED

As this was written, Diem still had not replied to a petition from 18 prominent Vietnamese protesting his restrictions on civil liberties and the press.

There is, as everywhere in southeast Asia, a shocking amount of government corruption. At the same time, Diem—who is regarded as something of a puritan—has clamped a tight lid on the easy vice practices which had earned Saigon a reputation as the "Paris of the Orient." Night clubs are required to close at midnight, and many do.

Diem's friends insist that his regime is misunderstood, but that the President himself recognizes its shortcomings and is moving to correct them. It is said he was deeply moved by the fate of Syngman Rhee in Korea and will not make the same mistake. He will gradually release liberty and power to the people before they try to seize it for themselves.

BANGKOK BEAUTIFIED—THAILAND MAKES BID FOR TOURISTS

(By Robert E. Lee)

BANGKOK, THAILAND.—A powerful central government, which has run the country under martial law since a bloodless coup in 1957, is setting out to make Bangkok the tourist and commercial capital of the Orient.

It is already one of the major crossroads of the eastern world. Twenty airlines, including the three U.S. commercial oversea carriers and the military's MATS, and 14 steamship lines regularly deposit thousands of tourists each week in this teeming city which sits astride a muddy river and is laced with even dirtier canals.

The city became a major transportation hub with no effort at all on the part of the Thai, beyond construction of a new airport runway big enough to handle jets. But the Thai Government is starting to take over in the tourism field. From here on in, nothing will be left to chance.

The Prime Minister, Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat, is personally interested in prettying up the city for the benefit of itinerant Americans, Australians, British, Germans, and other tourists.

He sometimes motors around town on a one-man inspection of the streets leading to and from the airport, the major temples and embassy row. If a dilapidated fence mars a good view of a temple or park, the owner gets instructions to paint it or tear it down—immediately.

The fetid klongs, or canals, which crisscross the city to provide bathing and drinking water—plus sewage disposal ducts—are slowly being decontaminated and cleaned up. The hotels, inadequate in number and always jammed, are learning how to cope with droves of guided-tour Americans who expect the superduper, TV-in-every-room service they get in motels on route 40.

TOURIST BOSS

But Marshal Sarit's biggest contribution to the development of tourism is the appointment of his long-time aide and military protege, Col. Chalermchai Charuvastr, as boss of the national tourist organization. He has given the colonel a new building and a free hand, and the colonel knows how to use both.

Object No. 1 at present is exploitation of native handicraft without exploitation of the tourists who buy the handsome silk, bronze, and lacquered products. To this end, the colonel has installed in his new building a fair trade center in which samples of Thai products are displayed along with reasonable prices for each item. There isn't much of a selection at the center, but the tourist learns what to pay when he goes out to market places.

Another bow to the tourists came in the form of registration of guides and standardization of their fees. The Government is about to open a school for guides.

Still another is a new practice of riding herd on merchants around town. In this country the seller as well as the buyer must beware.

Colonel Chalermchai, who understands Americans as well as most orientals by virtue of a 3-year stint as military attaché in the Thai Embassy in Washington and frequent trips to the States, also encourages the country's craftsmen to confine their art to typical Thai products.

"If people want to buy a salad bowl, they go to Europe," he told this reporter the other day. "We can't make French and Italian products as well as they are made in France and Italy. So I tell our people to make Thai products the tourist won't find anywhere else in the world."

Most of the tourism pitch is directed at Americans, who comprise the vast majority of visitors here. The colonel has been negotiating with two big American hotel chains in hopes of relieving the serious accommodations pinch. So far he has gotten nowhere. "The Americans want to manage our hotels but they want us to build them." But the Government itself is reluctant to put up new hotels because it hasn't yet redeemed its pledge to house the Thai people, many of whom live in squalor in the heart of the capital.

TAX BENEFITS

Encouragement of foreign investment is the big corollary to development of tourism. The climate appears to be satisfactory for it. The currency is stable, as is the exchange rate. Handsome tax benefits are available. There is plenty of local cash—mostly in the hands of the Chinese community—ready to be lent to foreign entrepreneurs.

Still, Colonel Chalermchai is unhappy about the state of tourist affairs. He points out that the Thai people have always been friendly to Americans and Europeans, probably because those—like the 19th century Anna who served a king of Siam as governess—who came here did good missionary work. "For a hundred years the white man has been our honored guest," says the colonel.

But there still aren't enough investors or tourists here and they don't spend enough money to satisfy the colonel. "We open our gates but they don't come in," he says sadly.

FUNDS FOR HEALTH, FARMING, WELLS, MACHINES—WHAT DO U.S. DOLLARS BUY FOR THAILAND?

(By Robert E. Lee)

KORAT, THAILAND.—This reporter doesn't know what the authors of "The Ugly American" or congressional critics of U.S. foreign aid might think of the way your dollars are being spent in Korat.

Indeed, it would be hard for him—or any other reporter—to learn, on a first visit to a strange land with a difficult language, whether you're getting value received in terms of local gratitude for your "buck."

But it's easy to see that some interesting things are happening up here in an agricultural center a couple of hundred miles from Bangkok—happening because of your money.

In the first place, you come part of the way here on a 140-kilometer highway called the Freedom Road. A marker says it was "Built by Thai-American cooperation and dedicated to the progress and prosperity of Thailand." Some people might call it a road to nowhere, because Korat really isn't much of a place by American standards. Its population is only 60,000 and there aren't many television sets. But it's the jumping off place to the entire northeastern part of Thailand—where much of the country's rural population is concentrated and civilization as we know it just doesn't exist.

The Thais themselves have mixed feelings about the Freedom Road. They all realize the necessity of a decent highway toward the northeast, and they know that this particular one is the best road in the country. They also know that it was cut for a good deal of its length through a jungle, which is now being turned into highly fertile farmland.

Homesteaders can pick themselves up some lush acreage, if they have the means to clear it and work it. On the other hand, some of the more sophisticated Thais are aware that the Prime Minister, Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat, and other bureaucrats in Bangkok have grabbed for themselves some of the choicest land fronting on the highway.

Enough of the road. What about Korat?

Well, the natives are pretty proud of their silk weaving, which they do by a special process that's unique in Thailand. But some of them also admit that they're learning new things—valuable things—because of American foreign aid funds. That is, if you can take the word of the local Thai who works for the U.S. Information Service here and who acts as your guide and interpreter—there being no others available.

About 100 Korat citizens a day brush up on their English language reading in the USIS library, so the man ought to know.

There's a big—by Korat standards—and new building here which U.S. dollars built for the Thai public health service. This is important in a country where cholera and malaria are still dread killers and other diseases are rampant.

There's a railroad repair yard, the biggest outside Bangkok, where car and engine repair and maintenance men use machines your dollars bought to keep the wood-burning engines running on the narrow gage rails. Your dollars also built the shop which houses the equipment. Each piece bears a painted emblem of the U.S. and Thai flags.

Korat's share of the $23 million or so a year Thailand gets from us in foreign aid isn't much. And maybe some of that is not used effectively.

But it's still pretty interesting to see the things your dollars are doing here.

TARIFF COMMISSION'S DECISION ON COTTON TEXTILE IMPORTS

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, it is no wonder that the cotton industry expressed shock and dismay when the report of the Tariff Commission was released on Monday afternoon, June 27, with a 4 to 2 decision that imports of cotton products were having no adverse effect on the cotton export subsidy program. The fears of many individuals that the case had been prejudiced from the beginning were borne out. The Commission's majority finding was a riddle of cross references citing limitations on the investigation. Its report gave the ludicrous suggestion that imports were beneficial to the cotton industry. The industry had wasted a year of precious time fighting an impossible adversary.

In its original petition to the Secretary of Agriculture, the National Cotton Council requested that he ask the President to ask the Tariff Commission to institute an investigation of the rapidly increasing imports of cotton textiles and cotton textile products by authority of section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended. The President, however, in requesting that the Tariff Commission make the investigation, chose to limit the scope of the investigation to imports which "render or tend to render ineffective, or materially interfere with the export subsidy program" of the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Nothing in section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act required the President to limit the investigation to the cotton export program. By this time, many Members of the Senate had become aware that the administration was deliberately attempting to limit the scope of the investigation. Therefore, in an effort to obtain a fair hearing covering the entire cotton program, instead of only the export phase of the cotton program, a letter was sent to the President by seven distinguished Senators who were following this proceeding carefully. The letter requested that the President remove the restriction and permit the Commission to use the full authority of section 22. I ask that the letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ENGLE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
January 25, 1960.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We were gratified last November when you referred the cotton textile import problem to the Tariff Commission for action under section 22.

It is quite disturbing to learn now, however, that the terms under which this matter was referred to the Commission severely restrict the Commission's investigation and recommendations to the one narrow point of the effect of these imports on our cotton export program.

The constantly accelerating increases in textile imports make it clear that this is one of our major problems and one that will grow only worse the longer we delay. An investigation that is so limited as to preclude a fair and objective appraisal of all of the pertinent facts will solve nothing. It will satisfy no one and, on the contrary, will tend to strengthen demands for some more direct form of action.

We, therefore, urgently request that you personally review this matter and that you modify your directive to permit the Tariff Commission to make a full and complete investigation of all the facts and make recommendations based on these facts as contemplated and authorized by section 22.

Respectfully,

HARRY F. BYRD.
RICHARD B. RUSSELL.
STROM THURMOND.
SPESSARD L. HOLLAND.
JOHN L. MCCLELLAN.
JAMES O. EASTLAND.
JOHN STENNIS.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, nevertheless, when the hearings began on March 1, 1960, the President had not agreed to remove his limitation. The cotton industry was considering dropping the case at this point rather than going through with a hopelessly limited investigation. It was then that a bit of encouragement was injected into the situation, causing the industry to pursue the case to its bitter and sorry conclusion. The Tariff Commission ruled that although it was limited by the President's request to an investigation of interference to the export program only, it would accept testimony on the effects of imports on the entire cotton program. As we can see from the Commission's report, this now appears to have been nothing more than bait to encourage the industry to present its case so an adverse finding could be made.

The industry presented its case fully, as it would have if the President had not impossibly limited the scope of the investigation, and the hearings concluded on March 9, 1960. On March 23, 1960, still hoping for a fair appraisal of this serious import situation by the Commission, the same seven of our distinguished colleagues sent another letter to the White House. This letter also pointed out the severe limitation placed upon the Commission's investigation. The Senators stated that they found no basis in the language of the act and still less in the spirit and intent of the act for the limitation imposed on the authority of the Tariff Commission.

The only bright spot in the Commission's findings was the carefully developed report of the minority. The minority statement of Messrs. Schreiber and Sutton so aptly observes:

> Although the export subsidy programs have been primary topics in this investigation, the consideration in vacuo of individual programs that are in reality segments of the total extensive national program on cotton is not a rational procedure.

Further evidence that the case was prejudiced from the beginning, and that the administration never intended to grant relief to the cotton industry, is contained in the Tariff Commission's report of the majority opinion itself.

> In this investigation we are not engaged in examining the effects of imports on the overall cotton program of the Department of Agriculture. We are limited by the Presidential directive and the notice of the Commission to the determination of whether imports of articles containing cotton are materially interfering with the cotton export subsidy program under section 203 of the Agricultural Act of 1956.

The majority concluded that they were limited to a consideration of the cotton export subsidy program and could not even treat it as a part of the total program to which it is so intimately related. But the Commission went too far in leaning on the President's limitation as an excuse for its finding. The majority used this limitation as a basis for the conclusion that imports of cotton articles could interfere with the cotton export program only if such imports reduced the exports of American raw cotton.

Then the majority went on to make this conclusion contained on pages 20 and 21 of the report:

> Production abroad of cotton articles for export to the United States provides a foreign market for raw cotton. Thus if U.S. imports of cotton articles should increase, the foreign consumption of raw cotton would increase; and, therefore, the potential market for U.S. exports of raw cotton would be larger than it otherwise would be.

How outrageously naive such a proposition is can be appreciated if the Commission's hypothesis is carried to its logical conclusion. According to this reasoning if 10 million bales of cotton are imported in the form of textile products—enough to shut down every spindle and loom in the United States—no protection under section 22 would be allowed the cotton industry.

This is a fantastic and ridiculous interpretation of section 22. It is a glaring circumvention of the protective measures intended by Congress when section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act was drafted and enacted into law.

This limitation by Presidential directive is something new in section 22 proceedings. It has no basis in precedent in the case of any other industry which sought protection under this statute. This is one more step in administrative circumvention of the intent of Congress and the expressed law of the Nation.

This circumvention of the intent of Congress was not accidental. The letters which I am submitting for the RECORD make this point perfectly clear. These letters, signed by many of the most distinguished and able men in the Senate reminded the executive branch before the hearings and again immediately following the investigation that section 22 is designed to protect the entire cotton program, and not just the export phase of the program.

A searching and complete investigation by the proper Senate committee of this entire shameful incident is demanded at this time. We cannot allow administrative edicts to deny an agricultural program the protection that Congress had determined it should have.

If additional legislation is necessary to secure protection against this continuing upsurge of cotton imports in the form of products, I hope the committee will propose it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD immediately following my remarks the letters to which I referred.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 19, 1960.

The Honorable STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR STROM: The President indicated to you in his note of February 2 that he would review once again the difficult cotton textile import problem, now before the Tariff Commission. This you had requested in your letter to the President on January 25.

The President's review of this matter has been undertaken with full awareness of the circumstances which your letter so clearly portrays. There are, however, impelling reasons for proceeding with the Tariff Commission review within the terms of reference originally laid down.

The Tariff Commission action has been taken under section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The purpose of that act is the protection of Government agricultural programs. A broadening of the inquiry such as the textile industry desires would have to rest on some different rationale and would necessarily contemplate a remedy more extensive than the amount of injury which could have resulted from the agricultural program in question. There are legal procedures, such as the "escape clause," which take account of injuries other than those arising from Government price programs.

You may be interested in knowing that the industry was made aware of our construction of the statute prior to the initiation of the proceedings now under way before the Tariff Commission. It was with this knowledge that representatives of the industry requested that an investigation be made under section 22.

For these reasons, it would not appear appropriate to direct a different scope for the present inquiry.

With warm personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

WILTON B. PERSONS,
The Assistant to the President.

MARCH 23, 1960.

Maj. Gen. WILTON B. PERSONS,
The Assistant to the President,
The White House.

MY DEAR GENERAL PERSONS: Thank you for your letter of February 19 in further reply to our letter of January 25, 1960, concerning the Tariff Commission section 22 investigation of articles containing cotton.

The Tariff Commission has now completed hearings in this investigation and, we are happy to note, the industry was allowed to describe fully the adverse effect of the increasing volume of cotton textile imports on the section 22 programs of the Department of Agriculture. We are now awaiting with interest the findings and recommendations of the Commission, especially with regard to the applicable remedy or remedies, if any, that may be recommended.

You state in your letter that the purpose of section 22, of the AAA, is "the protection of Government agricultural programs." Then you state, "A broadening of the inquiry such as the textile industry desires would have to rest on some different rationale and would necessarily contemplate a remedy more extensive than the amount of inquiry which could have resulted from the agricultural program in question."

We wonder if this is not, to some extent at least, a prejudging of the case and we cannot quite grasp the reasoning which would limit the application of a proposed remedy to only those imports which would be definitely ascertained as the ones which were induced or attracted by the program.

Section 22 was designed to restrict imports which materially interfere with or tend to render ineffective any agricultural program or to reduce substantially the amount of any product processed in the United States from any agricultural commodity or product thereof with respect to which any such program or operation is being undertaken. The character and extent of the restrictions that may be imposed are specified in the statute.

We can find nothing to support the view that the remedy to be applied must be limited so as to affect only the imports that may have been induced by the program. In the first place, imports are a known quantity and their effect on section 22 programs can be identified within reasonable limits.

On the other hand it would appear to be in the realm of pure guesswork to set out a figure that might be claimed as the specific amount of imports "which could have resulted from the agricultural programs in question."

The language of the statute and its legislative history do not support such a view; quite to the contrary, does not section 22 contemplate the protection of agricultural programs from excessive imports regardless of the reason for those imports?

Our constituents and friends in the cotton industry were made aware early in the procedure that some representatives in the executive branch construed in a very limited way the area of possible relief under authority of section 22. In fact, they knew that these individuals would not favor any relief beyond an offset for the 8 cents per pound export subsidy on raw cotton. The industry does not and never did agree with this specific limitation of remedy regardless of the extent of interference. Such a remedy could be only a slight deterrent to the continued displacement of domestic cotton by increasing imports which displacement basically constitutes the material interference with the program and tends to render it ineffective. Furthermore, the industry had not even a hint that there was an intention to limit the Tariff Commission either in the scope of the hearings or in its recommendations for relief. In fact it was expected that the Tariff Commission, and not the President, would interpret "interference" and measure the extent of its own authority to recommend remedies under section 22. It was not anticipated that any Presidential directive could "amend" section 22 or would interpret it in such a way as to render it impotent.

We sincerely thought that the precedent set in 1939 on the same subjects and in very similar circumstances would be followed in this case. In that situation the President's letters (July 26, 1939) directed an investigation to determine whether cotton and cotton products, respectively, were "being imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with said programs or to reduce substantially the amount of any product processed in the United States from cotton."

"Said programs" had been previously identified in the President's letters as "the program with respect to cotton undertaken pursuant to the provisions of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, and particularly with the cotton and cotton products export program now being carried out by the U.S. Department of Agriculture."

The July 26, 1939, letters above quoted were the first directives issued by the President under section 22. They were issued under conditions of surplus stocks of domestic cotton and a cotton and cotton products export program similar to the surplus conditions and the export program now existing.

It should not be surprising that the cotton industry can understand neither the reasons for such a radical departure from the earlier precedent set under almost identical conditions nor the purpose in such a narrow interpretation of the intent of the act.

The Commission, in the earlier case, recommended and the President then proclaimed, the full remedy then authorized by the law with regard to raw cotton. There was no question but that the statute was interpreted in the manner Congress intended that it should be, namely that of requiring no arbitrary limits on the scope of the investigation or on the extent of the remedy. We can find no change in language or intent of the statute since 1939 that would justify a directive that the Tariff Commission limit its study of all the facts or hold its recommendations to a prestated figure regardless of what the facts show.

For these reasons we believe the Commission should be bound only by the limitations in the statute in making its findings and recommendations. We fully recognize that the statute does authorize the President to make the final decision after the Commission's report and recommendations. We find no basis in the language of the act, and still less in the spirit and intent of the act, for the directive to the Tariff Commission to "determine whether a fee equivalent to the per pound export subsidy rate on the cotton content of imported articles containing cotton is necessary to prevent the imports of such articles from rendering or tending to render ineffective or materially interfering with the department's export program for cotton and cotton products."

We hope that a careful review of the language and intent of the statute will convince you that all the facts should be brought out and all the remedies made available should the facts so warrant. If there are policy reasons for withholding the facts or limiting the remedies we feel we should be made aware that such is the case.

Sincerely,

HARRY F. BYRD.

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Hon. JOHN C. STENNIS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: I appreciate having the section 22 discussion that you and six of your colleagues provided in your letter of March 23.

As you note, the Tariff Commission has completed its cotton textile hearings, the parties in interest apparently presented all the evidence they considered relevant to their interpretation of the proper application of section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act to this problem. Thus, the record will be complete.

It would seem best, therefore, that any further decision by the President on the question at issue awaits reflection upon that record, together with the Commission's forthcoming report and recommendations. You may be sure that the views stated in your letter will be fully weighed in this connection.

With warm personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

WILTON B. PERSONS,
The Assistant to the President.

Mr. JORDAN, Mr. TALMADGE, and Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I had promised to yield first to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE].

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JORDAN] has a luncheon engagement with a Member of the House, and while I appreciate the courtesy of the senior Senator from North Carolina, I ask that he yield to his colleague first, and that he then yield to me.

Mr. ERVIN. I shall yield to my colleague first, then to the Senator from Georgia, and then the Senator from New York.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, I thank the senior Senator from North Carolina. I desire to associate myself with the remarks that he has made on this very vital problem. The problem is vital not only to North Carolina, but also to the entire United States, because the textile industry is not confined to North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, or any number of particular States. The industry has plants in New England. In fact, there are garment manufacturing plants in practically every State in the Union.

I believe that to continue the manner in which the administration is handling the import problem will not only wreck the industry of cotton farming, but will also wreck all industries connected with it. The administration might have gone a little further in its findings, and by checking could have ascertained that Spain has become a very large exporter of cotton fabrics and yarns into the United States. The biggest part of the cotton that they use in their products which are shipped here is grown in Spain. I cannot see that the findings relate to the existing situation. I do not think that the Commission was guided by the facts at all. As the senior Senator from North Carolina has said, the administration determined the formula it would use in order to get out of doing anything about the problem.

Mr. ERVIN. There is no doubt about it. To illustrate, it is like the case of a man who goes to a doctor for a complete physical examination. The doctor examines his little toe, and diagnoses the condition of the man's lungs, heart, and all of his other organs on the basis of the condition of his little toe.

Mr. JORDAN. That is about what the administration has done.

Brazil is a large exporter of cotton to places other than the United States. At the same time, Brazil has become a large manufacturer of textiles, and is exporting textiles to the United States. So we are not only giving away the interests of the cotton farmers; but also our domestic markets for cotton products, which is causing a shutdown of mills in this country as well as in others.

This subject is not confined solely to cotton, by any means. As my able colleague knows, North Carolina has become a large producer of carpets. The carpet industry is a large industry in North Carolina and ships carpets all over the country.

Day before yesterday I attended a meeting of the National Carpet Institute in Washington, and I was informed that the importation of carpets into the United States has risen from nothing in 1948 to 23 percent of the present market. That is 23 percent of the entire market of the United States, which represents millions and millions of dollars. There is no protection whatsoever. The same process is occurring in that industry. We started with a duty of 30 percent, and in 1951 it was reduced to 25 percent. In 1957 the duty was reduced to 23½ percent. In 1959 it was reduced to 21 percent. In that period imports jumped from nothing in 1948 to 23 percent of the entire United States market. The tariffs were constantly reduced on this product. That is another industry that is going right down the drain along with other textile industries.

I commend my able colleague for the fine presentation he has made, and I wish to associate myself with all the remarks he has made. I again assure him and all other Senators that I shall be most happy to join in any type of legislation which will force the Tariff Commission and the administration to do something about the problem.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank my colleague for his very vital contribution to this discussion. I now yield to the able and distinguished Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for yielding to me. I compliment him on his statement, congratulate him, and associate myself with the remarks he has made.

To my mind it is indeed a strange thesis as to how any agency of our Government fails to consider their responsibility of protecting American investments, American jobs, and American taxpayers. Yet they go out of their way to protect those same areas of activity in foreign countries.

Let us assume that some cotton goods that have been spun into cloth are brought into this country from Hong Kong, and that the cotton was grown in China. Does that not deny the American farmer the right to grow that same amount of cotton?

Mr. ERVIN. There can be no question about that in the mind of any intelligent man.

Mr. TALMADGE. Does it not further deny an American the opportunity to spin the cotton into cloth?

Mr. ERVIN. Absolutely.

Mr. TALMADGE. Does it not also deny American industry the right to manufacture the cotton into cloth?

Mr. ERVIN. It certainly does.

Mr. TALMADGE. Can anything, therefore, be more extreme than the statement of the Tariff Commission, that the importation of cotton goods in America does not affect the production of cotton in America?

Mr. ERVIN. The Commission did not exactly make that finding. It found that it did not interfere with the export program. Of course, I think it was right in one respect. If all the cotton mills in the United States were closed, it would bring about a complete end to the textile industry, and would encourage the importation of all American cotton abroad, because there would be no place in America where cotton could be manufactured into textile products.

Mr. TALMADGE. Does not the law prescribe the duty of the Tariff Commission to investigate the effect of the importation of articles into this country?

Mr. ERVIN. The law provides that the Commission shall conduct an investigation to determine whether imports substantially reduce the amount of any product processed in the United States—not abroad, but in the United States—from an agricultural commodity with respect to which a program has been established.

Mr. TALMADGE. Is the primary responsibility of the Tariff Commission to investigate exports or imports?

Mr. ERVIN. It is their duty to investigate the effect of imports upon the products made by Americans out of agricultural commodities grown in America.

Mr. TALMADGE. So the Tariff Commission approached the problem exactly in reverse. Is that correct?

Mr. ERVIN. That is exactly right. They were not concerned about the effect of imports; they were concerned about exports.

Mr. TALMADGE. Would not the distinguished Senator agree with me that unfortunately many policies of our Government in recent years relating to this situation have been approached in reverse?

Mr. ERVIN. Unfortunately the administration has committed to the State Department the power to barter away the investments and jobs of every American in any industry in the United States.

Mr. TALMADGE. They are using that as an instrument of foreign aid, rather than for the protection of jobs of American people and the American taxpayer. Is that correct?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. The administration is proceeding on the theory that the last person on earth to whom the American Government owes any consideration is the American citizen, who pays the taxes which enable the United States to function.

Mr. TALMADGE. Twenty years ago we heard the slogan "America First." Would not the Senator agree with me that the present policy is one of "America Last"?

Mr. ERVIN. Absolutely.

Mr. TALMADGE. I know that the able Senator, coming from a great industrial State, North Carolina, with its major emphasis upon textiles, well knows the problem. The same problem exists in Georgia and in other States, as has been pointed out by the junior Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Not only with respect to the textile industry, but also with respect to a number of other industries.

Mr. TALMADGE. That is correct. Since the end of World War II, a third of the textile jobs in this country have been liquidated. In my State of Georgia, little towns and villages which used to hum with employment, with weekly payrolls, have their mills standing idle today. They have ceased to have employment in their textile mills. They have had to abandon their jobs. They have had to move to other areas to compete with an oversupply of labor. The State Department and the Tariff Commission refuse to take any action and continue the program of liquidation of American jobs in the textile industry and the liquidation of the American farmers who produce the cotton.

I congratulate the able Senator from North Carolina and I pledge to him and to all other colleagues in the Senate of like mind my support to do everything possible to correct this situation in the 87th Congress.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his contribution to the debate. I also thank him for the loyal efforts which he has made at all times to see to it that American investments and American jobs are not destroyed by a program which is incorrectly presented by its advocates as being in harmony with Cordell Hull's concept of reciprocal trade.

As the Senator from Georgia knows, the execution of the agricultural program, as well as the execution of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act by the administration, is directly opposite to the concept of Cordell Hull, who said that the only mutually satisfactory trade our Nation could have with other nations would be a trade under which we would export to other countries the goods we produced in surplus quantity, and import from those countries the goods which we either could not produce or could not be produced effectively.

Mr. TALMADGE. In other words there is nothing whatever reciprocal about a trade policy under which we bring cotton goods into this country when we have already an overabundance of cotton goods.

Mr. ERVIN. This act and the Reciprocal Trade Act are both being administered to encourage the importation into this country of goods which we are already producing in surplus quantities. That is not only directly opposed to the concept of Cordell Hull, but also results inevitably in robbing American investors of domestic markets and robbing American workers of their jobs.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall not undertake any parliamentary maneuvers, even if I could succeed—which I know I could not—in getting the Senator to make any admission against interest. However, I am interested in a sociological fact, and I hope the Senator will take this question in that spirit.

The South used to be the great advocate of reciprocal trade. As a matter of fact, the South used to be the great advocate of free trade. The North was the protectionist stronghold. Hence the McKinley idea, with reference to tariffs, was the big thing in the Republican Party. Can the Senator tell us, without in any way jeopardizing his own stand, the sincerity of which I understand, what has brought about this change? What is causing the shift of so many Senators and Representatives in this trade picture?

Mr. ERVIN. I believe I can inform the Senator from New York on that point. When the South advocated free trade, we had no minimum wage laws for American industry, which compel American manufacturers to pay a minimum wage.

We had virtually no national debt. At that time the cost of our production could rise and fall with the demands of the market, including the world market, insofar as it was permitted to do so by the higher Republican tariffs.

However, we are living in a different age. We now have a minimum wage law, which puts a floor under the wages of American workers. We have a Federal income tax, which takes 52 percent of all the net earnings of all the manufacturers in the United States who operate under corporate franchises. The only way we can have free trade is to have a situation under which the cost of goods can rise and fall with the demands of the market.

When the Federal Government is confiscating 52 percent of all the net profits of all the American manufacturers operating under corporate franchises, and American manufacturers are required to pay a minimum wage of $1 an hour, and are actually paying a wage in excess of that in most instances, it is absolutely impossible for the cost of production of goods in America to rise and fall with the demands of the market. This is true because we cannot eliminate the high taxes. Moreover, we cannot place Americans on the wage scale of the people with whom they compete. It is absolutely absurd to expect Americans, under these circumstances, to compete with men who draw only 10 cents or 15 cents an hour. Yet that is what the administration is trying to require us to do.

As a result, our imports are actually exceeding our exports at this time somewhere in the neighborhood of $4 billion or more.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to correct the Senator on that point. I know he is wrong on the facts. Our imports this year will be roughly between $15.5 billion and $16 billion, and our exports will be between $18 billion and $18.5 billion. I do not know where the Senator obtained his figures.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator's figures include all the agricultural products which we are shipping abroad and giving away.

He is also counting expenditures of American tourists. He is also counting all the other things, tangible and intangible, which we are sending abroad.

Mr. JAVITS. I must advise the Senator from North Carolina that I am talking only about commercial exports and imports. However, we will have a chance to debate the question at another time. I did not mean to detain the Senator on that point.

May I ask the Senator another question? I do not want to trouble the Senator now to debate the issue. We will have a chance to do that later. However, is it not true that economics, being impressible, finds its own level, no matter what we do about it? The fact of that, as we know, many of the towns to which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] referred are suffering because of the obsolescence of the industrial society in its various phases, whether it is horses and buggies, or whatever occurs in an industrial society—is it not true, therefore, that as economics is irrepressible, and synthetics compete with cotton and various other types of economic displacement, might it not commend itself to the South to accept some type of help from Government in terms of an opportunity to make adjustments, because adjustments are necessary, and some help is deserved?

Somehow or other, no matter how one might be successful in case A or case B, apparently it is necessary to undertake some major domestic economic shifts. My feeling is that we ought to get together on the proposition that there should be help in meeting them. While the Senator might try to change the situation in his way, and I in another, at least might we not agree on the fact that there has to be some help in bringing about an economic shift?

Mr. ERVIN. If this administration and the succeeding administration continue to proceed upon the theory that American investments and American jobs must be sacrificed for the benefit of foreign countries, then I think we shall finally have to put all Americans on the dole. I do not favor that.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not believe the Senator is giving my question its due. I really did not direct it to the Senator in any contentious sense. So I shall desist. It was not in that spirit that I asked the question.

Mr. ERVIN. I disagree with the Senator in this field. We have minimum wage laws and tax laws that prevent American products from competing with foreign products made by cheap, sweatshop labor out of raw materials which we sell to them at prices less than those paid by American industries. In the case of cotton, we sell American cotton to foreign countries for 6 or 8 cents a pound less than the prices at which our own manufacturers can buy cotton.

I have seen no figures as to the gap in our foreign trade for the year which ended June 30, 1960. However, if I have any recollection at all which is still functioning, the administration admitted that for the year ended June 30, 1960, the gap between our exports and imports amounted to approximately $4 billion.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe the figures which the Senator has given relate to the amount of our imbalance in international payments in exports and imports. I shall place the correct figures in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. We shall be debating this question.

Strangely enough, notwithstanding the Senator's answers, I think we can and will find some common ground on which to debate. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for yielding.

Mr. ERVIN. I think that if this administration lasts long enough and pursues its present policies in this field long enough, and finally wrecks some major American industries, it may then find some common ground with us and cease to place the interests of foreign countries above those of America. I am hoping that it will do this, however, before it destroys American industries and drives Americans out of the only kinds of jobs they know, and undertakes to educate them to perform work in other fields, which, in all probability, are already filled with industries producing as many goods as can be consumed.

Mr. JAVITS. Every dollar of the $500 billion gross national product refutes everything the Senator from North Carolina has said.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from New York and I disagree on that point. The Senator restricts the trade relationship of the United States to the world. This relationship has to be measured by the exchange of all factors.

I still maintain that there is a gap in our dealings with foreign countries, and we are getting the short end of the economic stick to the extent of $4 billion a year.

I may also say that when he restricts matters to commercial products alone, the Senator from New York is including about $1.5 billion of surplus agricultural products which are being exported under Public Law 480, and which constitute, in effect, gifts from the American people to foreign countries, rather than commercial transactions.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that in industry after industry, this Nation had at one time low-cost producers, considering the entire world, because we had superior equipment and superior skill? But under the foreign aid program, we have gone all over the world and taught people how we do things, and have provided them with our machinery. For example, the Senator was discussing textiles. He well knows that it was the leaders of the American textile industry who went to Japan and helped the Japanese to organize their plants with the most efficient, latest, modern American equipment.

Also, I am informed—and I believe the statement is correct—that the Japanese have actually come to the United States to learn how an American applies for a patent on textiles; and before the American could even get a patent, the Japanese would have manufactured the same equipment in Japan, based on the publication which they found in the application in the U.S. Patent Office.

Mr. ERVIN. I understand that to be correct. Furthermore, after American finance assisted in building the Japanese textile industry, the agency which has charge of our foreign aid program, the ICA, sent one of its experts to the Philippines to assist the Philippines to build up a textile industry also.

The expert recommended to the Philippine Government that it erect tariff walls around the Philippines so high that no textile product whatsoever could get over them.

Thus the State Department, on the one hand, tears down the protection for American workers, and, on the other hand, urges foreigners to build barriers against our trade.

Furthermore, the ICA has been charged—and, so far as I know, it has never denied the accusation—with actually soliciting Americans to go into Indonesia to build textile plants. According to the charge, it has offered to advance money out of foreign aid funds to build the plants, and to guarantee that the operations of such plants would be profitable.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from North Carolina is eminently correct. Incidentally, Louisiana no longer is a textile-producing State. We do not hear much complaint about textiles, because our industries have now been run out of that business. We have already experienced what the Senator's State of North Carolina is experiencing now, so far as textiles are concerned.

With what has already been done with our foreign aid money—the American taxpayers' money—foreign producers are now in such a position that they can completely run out of business the American textile manufacturers, and do it largely with American money.

Also, our oversea oil industry, in the face of competition from foreign oil, has been completely run out of business.

Furthermore, with foreign aid funds and American help, the fishing fleets of foreign nations have been improved to assist in building up the economies of those nations. With their low wage standards, they have taken 40 percent of the American market for shrimp, and are in a position to take all the rest of our market.

In item after item, foreign nations are now in a position where they can completely run the Americans out. This result has been achieved with American foreign aid money.

It seems to me that the fair thing we might do would be to offer American industry some assurance that when it has to face a competitor in a foreign land, we will help the American industry to survive.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator's point is well taken. Section 22 was placed in the law to make it certain that American Processors of Agricultural Products covered by a governmental program would not be hurt by foreign imports. American manufacturers are supposed to be given protection, in proper cases, either in the form of increased tariffs, or by the imposition of quotas. I prefer quotas.

I respectfully submit that if the American textile industry is to continue to prosper, and if it is not to lose its domestic markets, the Federal Government cannot continue to ignore the concept of Cordell Hull, which is that the United States ought not to import things it is producing in surplus quantities. The Tariff Commission should have been allowed, by the President's order, to investigate whether or not quotas should be imposed to protect the American textile industry from imports. Instead of that, the President restricted the investigation by the Tariff Commission to the effect of imports on the cotton export subsidy program. We did not need an investigation to determine that the destruction or impairment of the American textile industry would promote the exportation of American-grown cotton. Strange to say, Mr. President, that, in its final analysis, is the basis on which the majority of the Tariff Commission denied any relief.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Of course the Senator from North Carolina knows that at least the Secretary of the Treasury realizes there is a serious problem because of the unfavorable balance of payments. In 1948, when I came to the Senate, there was much talk about the dollar gap—meaning that foreign countries had only very small amounts of dollars, and therefore could not afford to make large purchases of American-produced goods. But that situation has now been reversed; and today the foreign nations hold so many American dollars that now they could, if they would, empty Fort Knox. In fact, if we do not do something about this situation, we shall not be able to protect the currency of the American people, for if the foreign nations were to call upon us only to redeem in gold the dollars which now are in their central banks—not to mention those that are held by their private citizens—our country would not have left enough gold to be able to fulfill the statutory requirement of $12 million of gold to back up our currency that is now in circulation here. I suppose the Senator from North Carolina knows about that situation. This problem is a very serious one, because at the present time we do not have sufficient gold to back up all the foreign holdings of our currency.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Louisiana is correct. In fact, I think it cannot be disputed that the entire program of the present administration in this field constitutes a negation of the Scriptural injunction that—

> If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

This administration is encouraging the importation into this country of large quantities of goods produced in low-cost countries abroad even though this country is producing such goods in surplus quantities; and anyone must realize that a continuation of that policy will result in robbing Americans of their jobs.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. For instance, since 1939, foreign importations of shrimp have increased from 4 percent to 47 percent of the domestic market requirements; and a projection of that trend indicates that in 5 years or more, foreign imports of shrimp will take 99 percent of the American market for shrimp. That situation is of great concern to Louisiana, with its fleet of 3,000 shrimp boats in operation. Yet when we try to have steps taken to stabilize the market for our own producers, the administration opposes the taking of such steps, and says we have too many shrimp fishermen.

Mr. ERVIN. And in one of the Randall reports it is suggested that we must aid foreign nations by depriving Americans of the jobs they now have, and educate them to do other work.

This situation exists not only in regard to textiles and shrimp, but also in regard to many other industries in many other fields.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It is said that we are supposed to have a favorable balance of exports over imports. But the Senator from North Carolina knows that that statement does not take into account the very large amount of foreign travel by Americans and the very large amounts of dollars our military forces stationed overseas spend in foreign countries. And when it is said that we have a favorable ratio of exports to imports, that statement also does not take into account, as the Senator from North Carolina has pointed out, the vast amount of economic aid we are dispensing all over the world and the flow of American dollars into foreign investments.

When all those factors and developments are considered, my best estimate and recollection is that our balance of payments amounts to a deficit of $3 billion a year. That is how the trend has been going.

Mr. ERVIN. A provision of the recent foreign aid authorization bill reflects the philosophy of the administration. This provision stipulates, in effect, that if Americans, instead of investing their funds in the United States, will invest them in mortgages upon the homes of private citizens of Latin American countries, the United States will guarantee the payment of the mortgages on those homes. That indicates the extent to which this administration has gone.

I thank the Senator from Louisiana for his efforts to see to it that American industries are not destroyed and American jobs are not obliterated.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I certainly am pleased to find that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Robert Anderson, is at least one person in this administration who realizes that we must stop this development, and must proceed in the other direction, because the administration has gone much too far in developing an unfavorable balance of trade, and has permitted and encouraged other nations to discriminate against American exports, while permitting foreign manufacturers to take the American market away from our own industries. At least the Secretary of the Treasury understands—from his contacts with foreign bankers—that this development has gone as far as we can possibly permit it to go; and he also understands, I am sure, that insofar as our ability to meet foreign demands for the redemption of our currency in gold may be concerned, we are broke.

We can no longer take care of the entire world. We must begin to protect ourselves. We must immediately take steps to do so.

The administration has placed American industries in so precarious a position that, today, half of them can be driven out of business at any moment by the imports coming from low-cost foreign producers.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Louisiana is correct.

Furthermore, the time will come when the United States will have to realize that American industry cannot be subjected to further sacrifices in an effort to purchase friends abroad. At that time, the United States will have to take steps to put an end to the special favors it is now extending to foreign countries at the expense of American industry and American labor. These steps, which will become inevitable to avert economic disaster at home, will lose friends. And, of course, a lost friend makes the most bitter enemy.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. In addition, the Senator from North Carolina knows that Texaco and Gulf and other American oil companies were encouraged to establish refineries in Cuba, and now Cuba is requiring those refineries to use only Russian oil.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to add my word of commendation, for what it may be worth, to the commendations already paid to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] and to other Senators who have assisted in bringing to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of the country the monumental injustice done and being done to a great segment of American industry.

The distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] is very well informed in regard to all the ramifications of this trend, as it affects so adversely the American textile industry, and he is well aware of the hardships that industry is experiencing because of the activities of the administration in placing upon it an undue part of the burden this country has assumed in supporting foreign industries.

I hope that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and my colleague [Mr. TALMADGE] will not become weary and will not cease their efforts, but will continue to hammer away on this theme until some necessary action is taken.

I realize that some persons in the United States are not now particularly interested in the present highly dangerous developments; they do not think these matters affect them particularly. But certainly the day will soon come when they will be affected vitally. And then the dreamers and the planners will have to descend from the ivy-covered towers in which they now live and make feverish and belated attempts to find means to repair the great damage done to American industries.

There have been attempts to lull the people into thinking that we were exaggerating the question, but that is simply not the case. It reminds me of the colored man who caught a catfish, brought it into his kitchen, put it on the kitchen table, and started to clean it. Of course, the catfish was jumping and squirming about. He said, "Be still, catfish. I'm not trying to do anything to you but gut you." All these people are doing is asking us to keep still and stand silent and see interests vital to our section of the country, and indeed, to the entire country, liquidated by this ill-advised approach.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his compliments and his very pertinent remarks.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the able and distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I congratulate the able and distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who is one of the ablest lawyers in the Nation, and who has a keen insight into the economic conditions of this country, especially in regard to the serious situation in which the textile industry finds itself today.

Every time the Congress considers an extension of the Trade Act, we get repeated assurances from the administration that there exist in the act sufficient procedures to protect domestic industries from destruction by virtue of imports; but when the domestic industries invoke the procedures which Congress established, the administration and the Tariff Commission, almost without exception, callously refuse to grant any relief, regardless of the severity of the damage to domestic industries, and in defiance of the clear and unmistakable wording and intent of the acts passed by Congress.

I ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina if that is not true.

Mr. ERVIN. It is undoubtedly true.

Mr. THURMOND. I call the attention of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina to section 624(a) of title 7 of the United States Code, commonly referred to as section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which reads as follows:

> Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that any article or articles are being or are practically certain to be imported into the United States under such conditions and in such quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective, or materially interfere with, any program or operation undertaken under sections 601–604, 607, 608, 608a, 608b, 608c, 608d, 608e–1, 608f–612, 613, 614–619, 620, 623, and 624 of this title or the Soil Conservation and the Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, or section 612c of this title, or any loan, purchase, or other program or operation undertaken by the Department of Agriculture, or any agency operating under its direction, with respect to any agricultural commodity or product thereof, or to reduce substantially the amount of any product processed in the United States from any agricultural commodity or product thereof with respect to which any such program or operation is being undertaken, he shall so advise the President, and, if the President agrees that there is reason for such belief, the President shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the U.S. Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigations under this section to determine such facts.

Would the Senator from North Carolina not agree that, in view of this language, the President and the Tariff Commission were defying the language of the act and the intent of Congress in limiting the scope of this investigation to imports which—and I quote from the President's letter: "render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with the import subsidy program"?

Mr. ERVIN. My answer to the question of the able and distinguished Senator from South Carolina is this: When the President restricted the investigation before the Tariff Commission solely to the question of the effect of imports on the cotton export subsidy program, the President in effect amended the act of Congress. This is true because section 22 clearly contemplates that the major purpose of an investigation under it is to determine whether foreign imports result in materially reducing the quantity of goods processed by American manufacturers out of American agricultural products covered by these programs. When the President restricted the investigation in the manner in which he did, he, in effect, amended the act of Congress and, in effect, denied the textile industry the protection which the Congress intended it should have.

Mr. THURMOND. Did not Congress, in enacting that law, envision that what has happened might happen, and did it not try to provide procedural remedies to protect the affected industry?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes; that is why it enacted section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. THURMOND. Does the distinguished Senator from North Carolina agree with me that the action of the President and the Tariff Commission was a very serious action with regard to the textile industry, in view of what has been occurring here within the past few years?

Mr. ERVIN. It was extremely serious. The restricted hearing calls to mind the incident mentioned in the Scriptures where someone asks for bread, and is given a stone. They gave out an illusory hope that relief would be granted, as section 22 contemplates, and then they restricted the hearing to such an extent that no relief could be granted.

Mr. THURMOND. Traditionally, the United States has been a net exporter of cotton cloth by a very wide margin. For instance, the ratio of U.S. imports of cotton cloth to exports of cotton cloth for the year 1949 was 2 percent. For the year 1958, the ratio had increased to 28 percent.

Does not the Senator feel that such a steady and substantial increase over that 10-year period, in itself, is cause for serious concern with regard to the textile industry, and sufficient cause for relief under section 22?

Mr. ERVIN. The answer to that is certainly in the affirmative.

Mr. THURMOND. In January 1959 U.S. imports of cotton cloth were 21 percent as large as exports. By December 1959, U.S. imports were 93 percent of exports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield so that the Senate may receive a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to each of the following bills of the House:

H.R. 4595. An act to clarify and make uniform certain provisions of law relating to special postage rates for educational, cultural, and library materials, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 7379. An act to amend the act of July 27, 1956, with respect to the detention of mail for temporary periods in the public interest, and for other purposes.

PARTICIPATION BY THE UNITED STATES IN RESETTLEMENT OF CERTAIN REFUGEES

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The House of Representatives has today——

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. EASTLAND. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. ERVIN. May I ask the purpose of the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. EASTLAND. I desire to make a motion for a conference.

Mr. ERVIN. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit me, I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi for that purpose.

Mr. THURMOND. Yes.

Mr. EASTLAND. The House of Representatives has today messaged to the Senate its disagreeing votes to the Senate amendments to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 397) to enable the United States to participate in the resettlement of certain refugees, and asks for a conference.

I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference requested by the House, and I ask that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Are the motions made by the Senator from Mississippi separable, so that the motion to agree to a conference can be separated from the motion to appoint conferees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. First the matter should be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 397) to enable the United States to participate in the resettlement of certain refugees and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi is separable.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I request that the motion be separated and that separate votes be had on each part of the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the motion will be separated.

The first part of the motion is upon insisting on the Senate amendments and requesting a conference with the House of Representatives.

The question is on agreeing to the first part of the motion. [Putting the question.]

The first part of the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second part of the motion is that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Upon that portion of the motion I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

I understand the Senator's views. The Senator understands my views. I have said before that I certainly understand the sincerity of the Senator's views. I hope he respects the sincerity of my views and the views of our other colleagues.

I had hoped that perhaps in this situation, in view of the way the sides lined up last night, there should be some fair representation and voice for the Fong amendment in the composition of the conferees. Would the Senator be kind enough to inform us what he has in mind in that regard?

Mr. EASTLAND. Yes. The conferees would be the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], taking the Senators in seniority on the Committee on the Judiciary, with the chairman.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator has in mind three conferees?

Mr. EASTLAND. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. As I understand the situation, the Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization of the Committee on the Judiciary also has as one of its members my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING]. Is that correct?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, that is correct, but I am not the senior member of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization on the Republican side. The chairman could inform us of that.

Mr. EASTLAND. If the Senator will pardon me, I could not understand the question.

Mr. KEATING. Who is the senior Republican member on the Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization?

Mr. EASTLAND. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. JAVITS. I was going to make a suggestion. I do not wish to tie my colleague into this, for I did not consult him about it, and this is entirely a unilateral suggestion of mine.

Mr. EASTLAND. I will tell the Senator this: We will insist on the Senate amendments. It is a matter of common honesty that the conferees on the part of the Senate are going to insist on the amendments. I know of no more fair way than to have the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], the ranking Democrat on the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. KEFAUVER], and the chairman, made the conferees. That is a common practice in the Senate.

Mr. JAVITS. I understand. I will state to the Senator what I have in mind, if the Senator will allow me 1 minute. I understand the situation, as does the Senator from Mississippi. We are sort of projected into something of a controversy, which probably none of us expected, at least with respect to the particular resolution before the Senate at this time. Nevertheless, it is before us.

I make the suggestion to my colleague, to the minority leader, to the Senator from Mississippi, as well as to the majority leader, that it might be well in this situation if the Senator would consider a conference committee of five members, which would allow my colleague from New York to serve. I repeat, I did not consult with my colleague, and I do not wish to embarrass him. Agreement to this suggestion would permit him to serve.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, even that would not permit the junior Senator from New York to serve on the conference committee, because the second ranking member of the committee is the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA].

Mr. JAVITS. I was thinking about the Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization. There are only two Republican members on that subcommittee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. EASTLAND. Very well. The Senator wishes to have a third Democrat appointed? Does the Senator wish to have the next ranking Democrat on the Immigration and Naturalization Subcommittee appointed?

Mr. JAVITS. I was going to respectfully suggest that to the Senator. As I have said, I realize this is a matter of comity, and that there is no force involved.

Mr. EASTLAND. The Senator is requesting that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and the chairman of the committee be named conferees.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it is apparent that little is to be gained by expanding the number of Senate conferees. I shall make my views known to the conferees whether or not I am on the conference committee, as is the privilege of any Senator. I have a proposal for a possible compromise between the views of the Senate and the other body. I shall discuss my proposal with the conferees whether or not I am a member of the conference committee.

Mr. EASTLAND. I am informed that the House has three conferees. The minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] can be trusted. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] can be trusted. I know the chairman is going to do the best he can on behalf of the amendments. I do not see what would be gained by arguing about this.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I respectfully submit that we do gain something, but obviously I would not wish to press the matter, for my colleague from New York, who I thought would suitably be one of the conferees, does not think that would be the most effective way to proceed.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the suggestion of my senior colleague and the confidence in me which he has expressed. However, since the conference committee would need to be expanded, I lean to the view that perhaps by consultation with the three conferees whom the chairman wishes to have named I could be equally effective and perhaps more effective than I could be as a lonely minority of one on a five-man Senate conference group.

Mr. EASTLAND. In fact, the chairman went beyond the Immigration and Naturalization Subcommittee, when he suggested the name of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] the ranking Democrat on the committee. That is the only fair way to proceed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I respectfully ask my minority leader what he thinks about this arrangement, and whether it is satisfactory to him.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the arrangement is entirely satisfactory. Speaking only for myself as one of the proposed conferees, I shall do my best to aggressively assert the position of the Senate. I shall do as I have done for over 25 years on conference committees. I shall do what I can to uphold the views of the Senate as indicated by the Senate's vote yesterday. Beyond that, we simply have to play it by ear. We have to ascertain what are the views and general opinions of the House conferees. I think I am free to assert now that if it is necessary, to secure a bill, to relent from the Senate position, that I would do, because this is International Refugee Year. If I cannot get a whole loaf I will get what bread I can. On that basis I shall keep myself flexible.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think I understand the situation. I have served the purpose I had in mind in raising the issue, having it discussed, and getting various points of view expressed on it.

I would be less than frank if I did not say we are not ready to fight on this particular resolution at this particular time.

Mr. President, I repeat what I said last night: This is the last time, if I am a party to the proceedings, that this will be the way we will get into and get out of an immigration resolution of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the second part of the motion by the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. FONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. FONG. As the author of the amendment, I am much pleased with the proposed selection of conference committee members. I know they will do a good job. I know they will assert the position of the Senate. I have great respect for their integrity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the second part of the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi.

The second part of the motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. KEFAUVER, and Mr. DIRKSEN conferees on the part of the Senate.

TARIFF COMMISSION'S DECISION ON COTTON TEXTILE IMPORTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] has the floor.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield further to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I will repeat my question to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

In January 1959, U.S. imports of cotton cloth were 21 percent as large as exports, but by December 1959, the U.S. imports of cotton cloth were 93 percent of exports. The imports reached an all-time record high of 241 million square yards in 1959. Does this not indicate that we are fast becoming a net importer of cotton cloth?

Mr. ERVIN. It undoubtedly does. It illustrates the point that this administration, while professing to follow the reciprocal trade agreement concept, has absolutely repudiated what Cordell Hull said on that subject, namely, that reciprocal trade requires that this Nation export to other countries goods which it produces in surplus quantities, and import from other countries goods which it either cannot produce or cannot produce effectively.

As the Senator from South Carolina well knows, this country has been for many decades one of the great textile producing countries of the world. For many years it has produced virtually all kinds of textile products in surplus quantities. When we encourage the importation of goods which we are already producing in surplus quantities, the inevitable result is that we impair the domestic market of the domestic industry and deprive American workers in that industry of their jobs.

Mr. THURMOND. In the first quarter of 1959, imports of yarn cotton were 282,756 pounds. In the second quarter they were 223,065 pounds. In the third quarter they were 194,189 pounds. In the fourth quarter, as was the case with the importation of cotton cloth, there was a tremendous increase, for our imports of cotton yarn in the fourth quarter of 1959 reached the astounding total of 680,427 pounds.

Those figures show the total imports of yarn for 1959 to be 1,380,437 pounds, as compared to 835,000 pounds imported in 1958.

Does this not indicate that we are also fast becoming an importer of cotton yarn?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes, the figures indicate that in a most startling manner.

Mr. THURMOND. We have considered cotton cloth and cotton yarn. The same trend applies to finished garments. For instance, with respect to shirts, in the first quarter of 1959 the United States imported 379,000 dozen shirts. In the second quarter of 1959, the imports of cotton shirts were up 22 percent, to 461,000 dozen. By September 1959, imports of cotton shirts had reached 1½ million dozen shirts, which was equal to the total imports for the entire year 1958.

Do not these figures indicate that not only are we importing ever-increasing quantities of cotton yarn and cotton cloth but also that we have now proceeded to import the completed garments in tremendous volume, such as cotton shirts, and does this not further deprive more Americans of jobs in the textile industry of this country?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. Moreover, it invades a related industry, that of garment manufacturing, which employs hundreds of thousands of Americans, many of whom will lose their jobs if this trend continues.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not true that if the trend continues the remaining textile mills in this country will finally be forced to close their doors, and millions of people will become unemployed by reason of that closing?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is correct. Because with our high rates of pay, in which all of us rejoice, and with the high rate of Federal income taxes, which all of us deplore, it is impossible for Americans to compete with those who work for only a small fraction as much as the average American in this industry receives. And, as the Senator knows, our industry is put at a further disadvantage by the fact that foreign industries can purchase our raw cotton from us at the rate of 6 to 8 cents a pound cheaper than the price for which our own industry can purchase it.

Mr. THURMOND. In 1958, a study of the textile industry in this country was made by the Textile Subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the U.S. Senate, which brought out that textiles rank second only to steel from the standpoint of national defense. Are we not jeopardizing the national defense of this country when we permit unlimited quantities of cotton yarn and cotton cloth and cotton-manufactured goods and completed garments to come into this country, and therefore cause our textile mills to close? If we have an emergency, domestic production will be badly needed, since only steel is a more vital part of our defense mobilization base. Is that not correct?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is absolutely correct. I should like to add that the junior Senator from South Carolina served as a member of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which conducted the textile investigation, and rendered most valuable services to our Nation in so doing. As a result of his service on the subcommittee and as a result of his long study of this problem, he is, in my opinion, one of the great experts of the Nation in this field. As a consequence, he understands the situation in which this country will ultimately find itself if the administration does not see fit to carry out the true intent and purpose of section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. THURMOND. In closing, I again wish to congratulate the able and distinguished Senator from North Carolina for so forcefully bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate and of the people of this Nation.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from South Carolina for his contribution to this discussion, and for the service he has rendered to the Nation in his fight to preserve fair play for the textile industry and those who work in it.

Mr. THURMOND. There is one question I almost forgot to ask. I believe a few minutes ago the Senator from New York, who is now on the floor and can hear this question, referred to obsolescence in the textile industry. Is it not a fact that in the South we have a higher production of textiles per man-hour than is found anywhere else in the world?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. THURMOND. Therefore it is not obsolescence that is causing the trouble; it is due to other causes, primarily low wage foreign imports.

Mr. ERVIN. The industry is compelled to compete with the products of countries which pay sweatshop wages, amounting to only a fraction of the wages paid in this country. In addition, our Government is selling cotton to foreign countries cheaper than the American textile industry can purchase it.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I am delighted to yield to the able and distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, who used to work in a textile plant, and who is familiar with the problems of the industry, not only as a result of his study, but also his experience.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his remarks, and I wish to commend him for discussing the subject today.

I worked in cotton mills many a day for 50 cents a day. That wage may sound very little in this day and time, but I have done that.

I wish to ask a question. Is it not true that the policies of this administration, and of the State Department in previous administrations also, have brought about the problem we have presently in this industry?

Mr. ERVIN. There is no doubt about it. Apparently the textile industry has been selected as a sacrificial lamb.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is true. When a doctor goes to visit a patient and diagnoses the case, he then tries to do something to bring about relief, does he not?

Mr. ERVIN. That is his function.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. We have been trying to interest the State Department and also the White House to try to diagnose the case and to cure the patient, for we have a sick patient. Is that not true?

Mr. ERVIN. That is exactly right. The patient is suffering from injury inflicted by imports. The investigation was confined to the investigation of the effect on the cotton subsidy export program.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is absolutely right. When they diagnosed the patient they did about what they used to do to us in the Army. They used to give us c.c. pills, and maybe an aspirin and send us back to our tent to rest a while. This situation reminds me of it. Today, instead of looking into the patient's sickness and what the trouble is, they turn around and look at some part of the body that is in good health, so to speak, and they try to cure another thing. Is that not correct?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. Instead of studying what section 22 contemplated, namely, the effect of imports of foreign textile products on textile products made in America out of American cotton, they undertook to investigate the effect of such imports on the exporting of raw cotton. They came to the conclusion that if less cotton is manufactured in the United States more American cotton will be exported. That is undoubtedly true. Indeed, if we abolish the textile industry entirely, all American cotton will have to be exported.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. They looked at it from the standpoint of whether they could sell to Japan.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. To Japan and other foreign countries.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Everybody knows what the answer there would be.

Mr. ERVIN. Especially since the Federal Government is going to sell the cotton for 6 or 8 cents less than it is sold in America.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. When an industry gets pinched, it begins to complain.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. At the present time the textile industry is being hurt.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. It is being hurt by foreign competition.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. It is getting hurt by cheap labor competition.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. It is getting hurt also because the foreign mills can buy the raw product at a price which is 25 percent cheaper than manufacturers in the United States can buy it for.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. And can buy it from our Government also.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is the situation in which we find ourselves.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. We are complaining about it. I warn other Senators about this. I have already heard a great deal of complaining from other industries. They are going to be treated with the same medicine by the same doctor. We will hear the same complaints from the coal industry and steel industry, and the manufacturers of other commodities in the United States. Is that not true?

Mr. ERVIN. That is undoubtedly true. I was told by a building supply man in my State that he could buy nails manufactured in Europe cheaper than he could buy nails from the American nail industry.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. And that includes all kinds of wire and steel and a great many other things. It includes steel which can be bought from foreign countries and brought into the United States and sold 25 percent cheaper than steel in the United States can be sold for. That is affecting the steel industry, is it not?

Mr. ERVIN. It certainly is.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Anyone who walks down the street can see one little foreign car after another.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. They are not American cars.

Mr. ERVIN. In most cases they are foreign cars.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. They are manufactured in foreign countries.

Mr. ERVIN. In many cases they are manufactured in foreign countries by American manufacturers pursuant to the policy which this administration is following, of encouraging Americans to invest money in foreign countries and then competing with American manufacturers in this country.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true that the biggest cotton-growers in the United States have gone to Mexico and have grown about a million bales of cotton there and have put it on the world market, and have taken it into the United States, in competition with our labor?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes; in doing that, they aid and abet those who advocate the ruinous policies we have been discussing. As a consequence, American cotton-growers are being robbed in a twofold way of a considerable portion of their domestic market.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. When our Government gave approximately a quarter of a billion dollars to Japan to rehabilitate her textile industry, did we not encourage that situation?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. We are now actually importing, not only from Japan but from other countries also, goods which we produce in surplus quantities. Such importation robs American workers of their jobs, American industries of their domestic markets, and American investors of a fair return on their investments.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true that our Government during the last 7½ years has refused to put any quotas on manufactured cotton goods manufactured in Japan and coming into the United States?

Mr. ERVIN. Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Japanese have themselves said, "We will just make it that much." They have put into effect voluntary quotas.

Mr. ERVIN. Congress delegated the power to regulate foreign trade to the President. The President delegated the power to the State Department. And insofar as the textile industry is concerned, the State Department has delegated the power to the Japanese Government and to the Japanese textile industry which actually determine how much of the American domestic market the American textile industry is to enjoy.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Along this same line, surely the two Senators who are discussing this subject recall that President Eisenhower promised to correct this matter. Do the Senators remember the "Dear Joe" letter he wrote to JOE MARTIN during the 1956 campaign, when he said he recognized the problem in the textile industry and promised that his administration was going to correct it? Do the Senators remember that letter?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I placed it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD about a year ago. Then a few months ago I put it in the RECORD again. It is rather refreshing for us to read that letter every once in a while. Does the Senator contend that President Eisenhower and his administration did not make that correction?

Mr. ERVIN. I contend that they did not. I contend that when the President ordered this hearing under section 22, the question to be examined was whether or not there was a material reduction in American textile products made out of American grown cotton by reason of these imports. The President would not let the Tariff Commission investigate that question under section 22. On the contrary, the President limited the inquiry to the effect on exports, not the effect on imports.

Mr. SPARKMAN. President Eisenhower, only 4 years ago, made a promise in writing, addressed to JOE MARTIN, who at that time was the Republican leader in the House, and who had taken the matter up with the President, that the President would take prompt steps to correct the situation. Four years have gone by, and nothing has been done.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wonder. We are on the eve of another election. Does the Senator think there might be another "Dear Joe" letter being written this fall?

Mr. ERVIN. I would not be surprised if we once again receive more promises than performance.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In other words, the contention of the Senator from North Carolina is that we cannot rely on these promises, and it looks as if Congress may have to act. Is that correct?

Mr. ERVIN. I think Congress will have to act.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator remembers, does he not, that in 1955, or perhaps it was in 1956, the Foreign Relations Committee barely missed putting an amendment on the mutual security bill to take care of this very situation? On the floor of the Senate an amendment was offered by the late senior Senator from Georgia, Mr. George, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and it failed of adoption on the Senate floor by a single vote.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct. As the Senator knows, Congress put in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act two provisions to protect American industry against imports, namely, the peril point and escape clauses. It also put section 22 into the Agricultural Adjustment Act to protect American industries manufacturing products out of agricultural commodities. Yet the American textile industry has been unable to get any relief under the present administration under any of these measures which Congress has created for its protection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall ask this final question: Does the Senator from North Carolina agree with me that President Eisenhower and his administration could correct this situation if they would?

Mr. ERVIN. There is absolutely no doubt about that. They have plenty of power to make a full and fair investigation under section 22.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Have they not had that power all along?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. But is it not true that they ditched that investigation and went off on another tangent?

Mr. ERVIN. They restricted the nature of the investigation to such an extent that it was made impossible, by reason of the restriction, to grant any relief.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Does not the Senator reach the conclusion, especially because this administration is a Republican administration, that if the next administration should be a Republican administration, it will be necessary to get relief from Congress?

Mr. ERVIN. I have no doubt about that. I despair of getting relief otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That being so, is it not correct to say that the textile industry may not be strong enough within itself to secure the necessary legislation?

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. It may then be necessary to have the coal, steel, and other industries, which are now beginning to get hurt, join with us, so that all of us can put our shoulders to the wheel.

Mr. ERVIN. I believe that is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. It will take all of the industries together to correct a situation which so badly needs to be remedied at this time.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from South Carolina is correct. I thank him for his participation in the discussion and commend him for the fight which he has waged at all times to protect basic American industries and those who work in them.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I favor protecting this industry and many others, as well, whether they be plywood, steel, automobiles, or others. They will all begin to suffer in the near future. They are not hurting too much as present, but it will not be long until they will be in the same position the textile industry is in.

JOSEPHINE LUE FAN (ALSO KNOWN AS JOSEPHINE FOOK-LAU), JOSEPH LUE FAN (ALSO KNOWN AS JOSEPH LEW-FAN), AND AURA JOAN LUE FAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2585) for the relief of Josephine Lue Fan (also known as Josephine Fook-Lau), Joseph Lue Fan (also known as Joseph Lew-Fan), and Aura Joan Lue Fan, which were, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, for the purposes of sections 101(a)(27)(A) and 205 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Joseph Lue Fan and Aura Joan Lue Fan, shall be held and considered to be the minor alien children of King Lue Fan, a citizen of the United States.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An Act for the relief of Joseph Lue Fan and Aura Joan Lue Fan."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on June 18, 1960, the Senate passed S. 2585, to grant the status of permanent residence in the United States to two beneficiaries who are the son and daughter of a U.S. citizen. They are natives of an adjacent island and were unable to adjust their status while minors by departing from the United States because of financial limitations.

On June 30, 1960, the House of Representatives passed S. 2585, with amendments, to preserve nonquota status in behalf of the beneficiaries. Under the amendments, the beneficiaries will have to depart from the United States and reenter for permanent residence.

This measure has been cleared, and I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments to S. 2585.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have received a number of requests from Senators with respect to the Executive Calendar. I have not yet been able to clear all of the items on the Executive Calendar. I hope to be able to clear everything which it is possible to clear before the recess.

However, no opposition has been expressed to the nominations of postmasters, and a number of Senators are interested in them.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, for the confirmation of the nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

THE ANTARCTIC TREATY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, may I inquire of the majority leader what he proposes to do about the consideration of the Antarctic Treaty?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I had hoped that it would be possible to proceed to its consideration before the recess. However, the Senator from Arkansas is aware of the problem which confronts us. I wonder if the Senator has any recommendation to make in connection with the Antarctic Treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As the Senator from Texas knows, I have tried to have the treaty taken up ever since it was reported by the committee. However, from the discussion which took place earlier with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], and some other Senators, I believe, it is now apparent that considerable time will be required to present their discussion of the treaty.

I think at this late date in the present session it will be impossible to allow enough time to fully discuss the treaty.

I wonder whether the majority leader would be disposed to have at least what we might call an informal agreement that early after we reassemble, the treaty may be scheduled for debate, in order to allow adequate time to the proponents and to the opponents to discuss it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The majority leader is always disposed to go along with the recommendations of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. If that is the chairman's wish, I shall be glad to assure him that after we assemble on August 8, we can proceed immediately to the consideration of the treaty; and if they wish it, all Senators can be on notice that that will be done; and we can order the yeas and nays on it, and can assure that that will be done early in the session.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would be glad to have that understood.

I think the treaty should have been acted on by now. But, for various reasons, that has not been possible; and I do not think it wise to take up the treaty this late in the session. I would have preferred to have had it taken up in the early part of the week. But at this time, and under the circumstances, I think the plan we now have will be best.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I shall have no objection to taking up the treaty. I shall certainly demand that a yea-and-nay vote be taken on the treaty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Oh, yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. But I hope no limitation on debate will be imposed in connection with the treaty, until at least I have an opportunity to present my views. I realize they may not appeal to others; but I have very decided views on the subject, and I wish to have an opportunity to present them. I do not mean to suggest that there will be a filibuster; but I wish to fully discuss the treaty, because I regard it as of great importance, and a very unfortunate step.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Georgia may be sure that I will remember his request and will protect his interest.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to state that I, too, am opposed to the Antarctic Treaty; and if there is to be a time limitation in connection with our consideration of the treaty, I request the majority leader to arrange matters so that I can speak at some length.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, if arrangements are being made in regard to the treaty——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. None is contemplated at the moment. Various Senators wish to have the RECORD show that they desire to be notified before the Senate proceeds to vote on the treaty.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I make the same request.

SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS TAX RETIREMENT ACT OF 1960

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. While we are talking about the calendar, beginning with the start of the bobtailed session commencing August 8——

Mr. RUSSELL. What does the Senator mean by saying it will be bobtailed?

Mr. SMATHERS. Well, I say to the Senator from Georgia that I hope it will be bobtailed.

So I wonder whether the majority leader can give us an indication in regard to the handling of House bill 10. It has been before us for 3 days now; but, actually, it has been impossible to have any coherent debate of it, because of the necessity of acting on the conference reports before the adjournment.

I thank the majority leader for having brought up the bill in the first instance; and I hope he will be willing to announce that it can be considered when we return in August, because it is obvious that we cannot dispose of it today.

A number of amendments—approximately 20, I believe—are now at the desk; and I think there is no possibility of our concluding our action on the bill today.

I wonder whether the majority leader would be willing to have us proceed with the bill in August.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I accept the Senator's suggestion.

THE U–2 PLANE FLIGHTS—LETTERS BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND SENATOR FULBRIGHT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of State and my reply thereto.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 1, 1960.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: During my testimony before your committee on May 27, a number of questions were asked about a decision not to suspend the U–2 flights because the summit conference was pending. On reading the transcript, it seems to me the testimony has left that point unclear. Accordingly, I should like to take this opportunity to clarify it, and would appreciate it if this letter could be made a part of your hearing record.

There was a decision not to suspend the flights. The President so stated in his May 25 radio-television talk, when he said "the question was really whether to halt the program and thus forgo the gathering of important information that was essential and that was likely to be unavailable at a later date. The decision was that the program should not be halted." While I did not participate in that decision, the President was nevertheless fully aware of my views and I thoroughly agree—as I indicated in my testimony—that the decision was a wise one.

This will clear up any uncertainty on this point which your hearing record may reflect.

Most sincerely,

CHRISTIAN A. HERTER.

JULY 2, 1960.

Hon. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Thank you for your letter of July 1 directed toward clarifying the committee's record regarding whether there was an affirmative decision not to suspend U–2 overflights in light of the approaching summit conference. Unfortunately, it will not be possible to include your letter in the hearing record, because that record has already been published. Your letter will, of course, become a part of the permanent records of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I shall also have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, along with this reply.

With all due respect, I do not think your letter clarifies the point very much. It states that "there was a decision not to suspend the flights" and quotes the President's speech of May 25 to the same effect. The President's speech was, of course, before the committee at the time of the hearings, and you quoted it then.

At that time, you also agreed that no specific decision not to suspend the flights was taken (p. 58). I infer from your letter that such a decision was in fact taken, that you did not participate in it, but that you agreed with it. Your letter also supports the inference, though less clearly, that the decision was taken by the President. But we are still left in the dark as to when it was taken and as to who, if anyone besides the President, participated in it. I am somewhat disturbed by the thought that such a decision would be taken without the participation of the Secretary of State.

Most importantly, the record is still unclear as to whether the decision applied to the program of flights, as an intelligence device to be continued over an indefinite period of time, or whether it applied to specific flights included within the overall program.

A related point has to do with the question of whether or not the flights were ever suspended for other than technical reasons. Because I intend to make this correspondence public, I am inhibited from citing here all the relevant statements in the classified record. If you will review this classified record, however, I think you will agree with me that it is, as the committee report says (p. 7), "at best highly ambiguous."

If earlier flights had, in fact, been suspended for other than technical reasons, the question arises as to why the summit conference was regarded as less important than prior events which were the basis for suspension.

I would welcome your further clarification of these matters.

Very truly yours,

J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman.

ADJUSTMENTS IN SUGAR QUOTAS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1901, Senate Joint Resolution 217.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution—Senate Joint Resolution 217—to authorize the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quotas for foreign countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to explain the reason for the motion I have made. Senate Joint Resolution 217 authorizes the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quotas for foreign countries.

We have at the desk a House bill in connection with extension of the Sugar Act for 1 year. I discussed with many Members of the Senate the desirability of taking up that bill. I had those discussions yesterday, the day before, and today. I have been unable to find any substantial sentiment among Senators in favor of having the Senate take any action on the House bill. I have been assured by dozens of Senators that they would vehemently oppose the House bill.

Therefore, in view of the apparent decision of a substantial number of Senators to oppose the taking of any action by the Senate on the House bill, I am in accord with the wish of the chairman of the committee [Mr. BYRD of Virginia] and various Senators associated with him—including the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] and other Senators who are very knowledgeable in this field—to have the Senate consider the Senate joint resolution, and to let the majority of the Senate work its will. For that reason, I have moved that the Senate proceed to consider Senate Joint Resolution 217; and I hope an early vote will be taken on the joint resolution.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, to consider the nominations on the Executive Calendar, beginning with the postmaster nominations, and with the understanding that later in the day I will clear all other nominations I can clear; and, if not, I will state the reasons why.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Seventy-seven postmaster nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the nominations on the calendar, beginning with the postmaster nominations, will be stated.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to state sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the postmaster nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the postmaster nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

POSTMASTER NOMINATIONS FILED AS OF JULY 2

The Chief Clerk proceed to read sundry nominations of postmasters filed as of July 2.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

THE AIR FORCE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Air Force.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that these nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

U.S. MARSHAL—NOMINATION PASSED OVER

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Ralph W. Gray, of Massachusetts, to to be U.S. marshal for the district of Massachusetts for a term of 4 years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

That concludes the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ADJUSTMENTS IN SUGAR QUOTAS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution—Senate Joint Resolution 217—to authorize the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quotas for foreign countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wonder whether we can obtain a unanimous-consent agreement in regard to a time limitation to apply to the consideration of this joint resolution. I wonder whether it will be agreeable to the Senator from Virginia that we have not to exceed 1 hour for the consideration of the joint resolution, with that time to be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the resolution. If all that time is not used, we can yield back some of it. Will that be agreeable?

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That will be agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state that a number of Senators have left their names on an informal list at the desk, and have indicated that they wish to speak on this subject.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, would the Senator from Texas be willing to have a quorum call, so that we may give the Senators who are interested an opportunity to be present?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly. Of course, this is a measure on which the House must act. The situation regarding Cuba is very important, and I think the House will wish to act on it, and we should give the House an opportunity to do so.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator did not refer to the time available for the consideration of amendments. Does the Senator wish to exclude any allowance of time for the consideration of amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No. If Senators wish to offer amendments, subject to the time limitation, that will be agreeable. Does the Senator from New York have an amendment?

Mr. JAVITS. No; but it is unusual not to include an allowance of time for the consideration of amendments, along with a time allowance for debate on the measure itself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well, Mr. President; I am glad to ask that the unanimous-consent agreement be amended to the extent of allowing 15 minutes to each side for the consideration of each amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. This problem might arise: The joint resolution might be passed, and some Member might use it as a vehicle for the passage of the House bill. I wonder whether we may obtain a commitment that the conferees would not use this joint resolution as a vehicle for finally passing the House bill—which, under those circumstances, could be handled without much debate.

There were only two votes against this resolution inside the committee, and those who object will be present here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I cannot commit the conferees, but from the opinions they have expressed now, and the desirability of the resolution, and their views on the House bill, I do not think we need entertain much doubt about their preference.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not so sure. There are some who would be conferees who would like to see the House bill adopted. There are some who would not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would think the majority would not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request of the majority leader is that debate on the resolution be limited to 1 hour.

Mr. LAUSCHE. When does the time begin—now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Immediately, if the request is granted.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much time does the Senator from Ohio want to speak?

Mr. LAUSCHE. It may be 45 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I make the request that when the Senator from Ohio has concluded his address, the limitation go into effect, so Senators may know we will take up the measure. It is very important, and I can think of nothing more important.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator from Texas said.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That at the conclusion of the address of the Senator from Ohio, the time limitation on the Byrd resolution go into effect.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from New York has suggested the possibility of an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I modified the request to include that.

Mr. ANDERSON. When the Senator from Texas stated it a moment ago, he did not include that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I modified my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the address of the Senator from Ohio, we will proceed to the transaction of the sugar measure, when the time limitation goes into effect.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I should like to defer my time until after action on the resolution.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio may yield to me for the purpose of making a unanimous-consent request, without his losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE DREAM OF CRAZY HORSE

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I was greatly interested in reading the account, in the March 31 issue of the Shannon County (S. Dak.) News, of a visit between Jake Herman and the late Chief Henry Standing Bear in 1939.

I well recall the visits "back east" of the chief in the late thirties and early forties in the interest of a memorial or shrine to the American Indian, the first American.

I had the honor of working with him to realize at least a part of his dream. Chief Standing Bear did live to see the Crazy Horse Memorial started by Sculptor Korczak Ziolkowski. While progress has been slow in carving the Crazy Horse Memorial in Thunder Head Mountain in the Black Hills of South Dakota, it has been steady.

I am hopeful that someday in the future the inspiration of Chief Standing Bear will be realized and that in some way he will be honored for the leadership he provided in the early days of the Crazy Horse Memorial.

Mr. Herman's visit with Chief Standing Bear will become a part of the history of the Crazy Horse Memorial. In my own files are many letters from Standing Bear which confirm his part in the inception of the project, as well as letters to and from Ziolkowski on the early stages of the development.

I ask unanimous consent that his article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHIEF STANDING BEAR AND KORCZAK ZIOLKOWSKI

(By Jake Herman)

Shortly after 1939 I came to Pine Ridge Agency and checked in at the Gerber Hotel. I was assigned to a cot down in the basement of the hotel, and Henry Standing Bear was an occupant of the room. As I approached, I could hear Henry softly singing the Chief song.

Said Henry: "I am glad you came. I just got back from the State of Connecticut. I can't sleep as I am too tired, so if you don't mind we will talk.

"Some time ago," Henry continued, "I went to the Re Sapa (Black Hills) and there I saw the faces of our four past great Presidents of the United States carved by the famous sculptor, Gutzon Borglum on the side of the Rushmore Mountain. As I stood there contemplating this great work of art, I thought to myself, why not interest some great sculptor to carve a lasting memorial to Chief Crazy Horse? After all, Crazy Horse died defending the sacred hunting grounds of the Sioux and the Black Hills.

"So I went back east to a place where I saw a stone and marble bust, the work of a great sculptor, Korczak Ziolkowski. I got his address and wrote him a letter in 1939. He came out here to see me and he invited me to come to his home back east. So I went to Connecticut, in New England, and was the guest of Ziolkowski. He has a fine home and a wonderful wife. They belong to one of New England's first families.

"In New England I appeared before clubs and people, lecturing on the life of the war chief, Crazy Horse. I told them of my hopes and dreams. I told them that if we Sioux Indians could get someone to carve the profile of Crazy Horse on some mountain in the Black Hills, the white people would know that the red man had great heroes, too. I told them that our people did not have the money to have this work done and we did not know where we could get it. But I told them that once the Black Hills were our sacred hunting grounds. Our great Sioux Indian leaders and warriors had given up their lives defending these hunting grounds and I told these people in New England that I thought it was only fit and proper that we should carve a memorial to our great leader, the war chief, Crazy Horse, whose Indian name was Ta Sunka Witko." (Pronunciation: Tah SHOONGka Weetkoh.)

Then Henry Standing Bear stopped talking for a while and we sat there rolling and smoking our Bull Durham cigarettes. This is what Henry Standing Bear told me shortly after 1939 before Korczak Ziolkowski had ever come out to the Black Hills or before the Crazy Horse memorial was ever started on the Thunderhead Mountain near Custer, S. Dak.

Henry was born in 1866 and he was only 11 years old when Crazy Horse was killed at Fort Robinson, Nebr. Henry, as a little boy, knew Crazy Horse and he was present when Crazy Horse died by the cold, hard steel—stabbed in the back by a soldier.

I can remember the night Henry told me of his hopes and dreams. Yes, and I can also remember how people became skeptical and how he was criticized and laughed at. In later years only Korczak Ziolkowski had the answer of the hopes and dreams of Henry Standing Bear, which hopes and dreams Henry made known in a letter that fired the imagination of Ziolkowski.

Korczak Ziolkowski is a Boston-born orphan of Polish descent, who although he had never had an art lesson in his life, quickly made himself rich and famous. In 1947, after he had served his country in war, he sold his Connecticut property and came to the Re Sapa, bought a ranch, and built a studio home. After the big blizzard of 1949 he constructed a 700-foot wooden stair case up the side of Thunderhead Mountain and today he is blasting and drilling away at the profile of Crazy Horse.

Up to date they tell me that Ziolkowski has spent $180,000 of his own money and hopes to complete his project within 20 years. Crazy Horse Memorial will measure 563 feet when completed, the largest sculpture of its kind in the world.

Some people in the Black Hills were skeptical when Ziolkowski first started his project and they called him a cheap imitator of Borglum. A high official gave Ziolkowski an upbraiding and accused him of trying to deface his mountains.

This writer was in Washington, D.C., when Ziolkowski appeared before Congress to get Federal aid or State aid and as far as I know Ziolkowski never did get Federal or State aid for this project, the only money being what the tourists left there—and this money was never used by him for personal expenses.

However, times have changed now regardin the attitude of the people in the hills toward this project. There is no denying what the Ta Sunka Witko Memorial has done for the tourist trade in the southern Re Sapa.

This is a story of two men, one with his hopes and dreams and the other with a determination to carry out those hopes and dreams to their ultimate conclusion.

Henry Standing Bear, who died in 1953 (about 4 years after Ziolkowski had started on his project) was the son of a warrior who knew Crazy Horse, in fact had hunted and fought alongside his chief and it was from such men as Henry Standing Bear that I was able to get the story of Crazy Horse's life as told to them by their fathers.

Henry Standing Bear was 86 years old when he passed away. I visited Henry 4 days before he died. We shook hands and as I was leaving, Henry was brave and smiling, although he took it for granted that he was leaving this world.

Korczak Ziolkowski (pronunciation: Kohrzhahk Zillcuffski) was raised an orphan and his Crazy Horse Memorial may appear to some people to be a fantastic project, but when you push an orphan around and this same orphan is carving a lasting memorial to a race that was pushed around, you have but one answer—When you are pushed from behind, you must be in front.

WEATHER MODIFICATION

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, on the 1st of June Dr. Alan T. Waterman, President of the National Science Foundation, sent to the President the Foundation's First Annual Report on Weather Modification. It should be read and studied by every Member of the Congress. It has an added significance at this time because the Senate Select Committee on National Water Resources has listed weather modification as one important means of increasing the available water supply. Everyone should be interested in the progress that is being made in both basic and applied research in this field.

I ask unanimous consent that certain marked portions from the report on weather modification be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION WEATHER MODIFICATION PROGRAM, 1959

ADMINISTRATION OF THE PROGRAM

The National Science Foundation was directed by Public Law 85–510 of July 11, 1958, "to initiate and support a program of study, research, and evaluation in the field of weather modification." The Foundation promptly established the new program and, during fiscal year 1959, expended $1,141,000 for research and evaluation in weather modification.

Following the usual pattern of Foundation operation, the program is administered principally through grants and contracts with university and other research groups. The Foundation has sought the advice and assistance of outstanding scientists and engineers in designing its program for weather modification so as to encompass all appropriate scientific talents and disciplines.

An Advisory Panel for Weather Modification was appointed with the following membership: Dr. Michael Ference, Jr., Ford Motor Co. Scientific Laboratory; Dr. Sverre Petterssen, University of Chicago; Dr. Vincent J. Schaefer, Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute; Dr. Max Woodbury, New York University; and as chairman, Dr. Reuben G. Gustavson, University of Arizona. In an early report to the Director of the Foundation, the panel stated:

"Placing this important field of research under the aegis of the National Science Foundation has given rise to a new hope and confidence that the instability factors in regard to size and time of support will be removed. This is already bringing young imaginative workers into the field. The rate of advance will to a large measure depend upon the quality of the trained scientists attracted to the problem. If good scientists are to be attracted into the program, the Foundation must be particularly concerned about the financial stability of the program."

In addition, all interested Government agencies were invited to appoint representatives to an Interdepartmental Committee for Atmospheric Sciences, formed to keep the Government fully advised of the expanding science of meteorology and to encourage coordination among related programs. The response was prompt and gratifying, and full cooperation has been assured. The Foundation looks to this interdepartmental committee to insure a cohesive and effective program, with each participating Federal agency conducting specific projects suitable to its own interests. As early evidence of cooperation, several joint research projects have been established between the Foundation and the Departments of Commerce, Agriculture, and Defense. Additional joint projects are anticipated.

The National Science Foundation approach to weather modification is relatively simple. The program has the objective of studying, more intensively than has been attempted before, the scientific basis of weather modification through long-term support of competent scientists working in cloud physics and allied fields. Premature efforts in weather modifications can result in large unwarranted expense. The Foundation agrees entirely with Prof. Henry G. Houghton, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who has written:

"One can be quite confident that the ultimate success of methods for the artificial release and control of precipitation will depend on the acquisition of much more complete basic knowledge of the ways in which nature produces rain and snow. Present attempts at rainmaking are often uncomfortably close to shooting in the dark. This is not to say that nothing was learned from or accomplished by these efforts, but simply that the effective control of any mechanism demands much more complete information than is now available on natural precipitation."

Under the National Science Foundation program a full range of theoretical studies, along with laboratory and field experimental work, is being pursued under the direction of research physicists, chemists, mathematicians, and engineers, as well as meteorologists. Hopefully, a continuing variety of trained scientists in many fields will find challenging problems to tackle in weather modification research and evaluation. A brochure is available upon request from the National Science Foundation which explains more fully the procedures to be followed in the submission of research proposals.

RESEARCH GRANTS AWARDED IN 1959

The research programs presently being supported by the Foundation fall into one of four categories: planning conferences, laboratory research, field investigations, and statistical evaluations. A description of each follows.

Planning Conferences

During fiscal year 1959, three workshop conferences were held to bring together scientists and engineers from the atmospheric sciences and related fields. Research findings were considered, and the most urgent and promising areas for future research were discussed and identified.

1. American Geophysical Union: The Cloud Physics Committee of the American Geophysical Union held an international conference on cloud physics in the spring of 1959. Twenty scientists from the United States and seven from foreign countries gathered at the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution in Massachusetts to discuss four major topics:

(a) The physics of precipitating clouds and cloud systems.

(b) The basic processes that determine the formation and the efficiency of precipitation.

(c) Artificial or man-caused precipitation.

(d) The structure of precipitation particles.

The meeting was most successful in bringing to light observations and theories on the basic physical mechanisms of precipitation formation.

2. Foundation for Instrumentation Education and Research and American Meteorological Society: This meeting brought 70 instrumentation specialists and research scientists working in the field of weather modification to Cambridge, Mass., on February 25 and 26, 1959. The most critical needs in instrumentation and techniques, as seen by the conferees, are: more reliable and simpler devices to measure atmospheric nuclei; more flexible and precise techniques for measuring drop size in the cloud; a faster, simpler, and broader range technique for measuring total liquid water content in the cloud; and better airborne instruments to observe drop charge and to measure general airflow within and around growing clouds.

3. National Academy of Sciences: The National Academy of Sciences arranged a conference on the design and conduct of research programs in weather modification. Experts from the fields of meteorology and statistics met to evaluate the requirements for the proper design and conduct of meteorological research programs which involve experimental control of meteorological factors. There were 31 participants, from Australia, Canada, and the United States.

The conferees agreed that the nonscientific nature of commercial weather modification operations offers little or no promise for advancing scientific knowledge. Very few of these operations are designed as scientific experiments, making a sound scientific assessment of their effectiveness virtually impossible. Financial support of weather modification experiments for developing scientific knowledge should, they felt, be channeled into investigations of relevant basic atmospheric processes and of modification techniques that employ scientific methodology and modern principles of statistical experimental design.

Fundamental research programs in the physics of the atmosphere should be designed to extend present knowledge, with the possibility that they will also lead to discoveries of new or unique atmospheric phenomena.

Laboratory Research

Prof. Horace R. Byers of the department of meteorology, University of Chicago, has received a 3-year grant for $383,700 for "research in cloud physics." The cloud physics research program that has been established is quite broad, for it deals with nearly every aspect of the water resources of clouds, including particles and nuclei, the ice nucleation process, and the growth of ice crystals and water droplets. Experimental laboratory research makes up most of the work, with some field research being undertaken to test laboratory findings.

Field Investigations

Eight of the grants and contracts will make extensive use of experiments in the field to study cloud formation and characteristics, and the possible changes in clouds induced by other than natural causes.

1. Atmospheric Research Group: This Altadena, Calif., organization has received a 1-year, $57,100 grant to conduct "field studies in cloud physics related to nucleation, hydrometeor development, electrification, and cloud dynamics." Field studies of small, simple clouds will be conducted to investigate the effects of time, temperature, humidity, and drop size of nucleation. Theoretical studies of the initiation of precipitation by ice and water mechanisms will be compared with actual measurements. Cloud seeding is used as a research tool. Most of the field measurements are carried on in the Flagstaff, Ariz., area.

2. University of Arizona: Profs. A. Richard Kassander, Louis J. Battan, and James E. McDonald, Institute of Atmospheric Physics, have received a grant of $161,800 for studying "physics of clouds and of cloud modification." During the summers of 1957 and 1958, under National Science Foundation and other grants, cloud-seeding experiments were conducted in investigations of rainfall processes. The investigators noted that mean rainfall was approximately 30 percent higher on seeded than on nonseeded days, and lightning flashes were about nine times more numerous on seeded days. This 3-year investigation will continue cloud seeding, with measurements to be made in and around the clouds, in an attempt to improve knowledge of cloud, precipitation, and electrification development.

3. Aerometric Research, Inc.: Robert D. Elliott of Aerometric Research, Inc., Goleta, Calif., is conducting an "investigation of precipitation processes and efficiency of Pacific coast storms" under a 1-year, $90,500 contract. Many statistical data on west coast storms are already available from the Statistical Laboratory of the University of California at Berkeley, and elsewhere.

This project will obtain and evaluate physical data on west coast storms which will then be combined with the statistical data to develop a complete model of a west coast storm. Data to be measured will include water content, nuclei number, potential gradient, and standard meteorological parameters. Comparisons of natural with artificially nucleated storms will be possible.

4. U.S. Weather Bureau: Dwight B. Kline of the U.S. Weather Bureau, Department of Commerce, is directing an 18-month program which has been granted $68,900, on "Synoptic Observations and Studies of Freezing Nuclei Anomalies." It has been observed that 30 days after meteor showers occur on the earth, a peak is reached in the number of freezing nuclei in clouds in widely separated locations. Other apparent coincidences between meteor showers and freezing nuclei have been noted. The U.S. Weather Bureau will conduct a systematic collection of data on freezing nuclei taken simultaneously at widely scattered places. It is hoped that definitive information on the effects of meteor dust and particles on cloud nuclei can be obtained from this study.

5. University of Chicago: Profs. Horace R. Byers and Roscoe R. Braham of the department of meteorology have received a grant of $114,300 to study "Physical Effects of Silver Iodide Seeding in the Great Plains."

Cloud seeding in mountain areas of the Pacific coast appears to result in measurable increases in precipitation. Over the flat terrain of the Great Plains, however, positive results have not been shown. The University of Chicago project will therefore release silver iodide nuclei from aircraft and investigate the resultant physical changes in the clouds themselves, rather than attempt to measure statistical departures in precipitation.

From this project it is hoped that estimates can be made of the actual physical changes in clouds which result from the seeding, and a theory developed explaining the process involved in these changes.

6. Arthur D. Little, Inc.: The National Science Foundation transferred $50,000 to the Office of Naval Research to provide joint support with the Navy's Bureau of Aeronautics for continuing the research of Dr. Bernard Vonnegut of Arthur D. Little, Inc., on "Cloud Electrification Studies."

Dr. Vonnegut is the young scientist who first discovered the possibility of using silver iodide as a seeding agent. His current work involves studies of the precipitation process and the role of electrification in thunderstorms. Dr. Vonnegut is also investigating the theory that cloud electrification may be largely a cause rather than a result of precipitation, as has been previously thought.

7. Meteorology Research, Inc.: This cloud physics research group has received a 2-year, $40,000 contract for "Continued Cloud Physics Studies at Santa Barbara," under the direction of Dr. Paul MacCready. For 2 years this group has cooperated in a large cloud-seeding project in the Santa Barbara, Calif., area. Among its techniques for studying clouds is the use of radar to observe differences between seeded and nonseeded clouds. The group is attempting to describe the individual storms encountered in as great detail as possible, determine differences between storms, and formulate hypotheses on the relative seedability of various storms.

8. Nebraska State Teachers College: Dr. Lyle Andrews is principal investigator of "A Physical Study of a Hail Suppression Program." He will study the properties of hail samples gathered from areas within and outside of a seeded district to determine the amount of silver iodide present in some of the hail and to study the role that this agent may have had in suppressing hail. Comparisons will be made of the samples on the basis of minimum temperature, structure of hail, undercooling, and silver ion concentration. The $11,000 grant will support the field sample gathering and laboratory work for about 18 months. Farm groups in northeastern Colorado and northwestern Nebraska are providing funds for the cloud-seeding activity.

Statistical Evaluations

Two grants have been made for statistical evaluation of cloud-seeding experiments:

1. University of California: Dr. Jerzy Neyman is directing a group in the statistical laboratory on "Randomized Cloud Seeding" under a 2-year, $64,900 grant. Cloud-seeding experiments have been conducted for 2 years in Santa Barbara and Ventura Counties, and are continuing. The data available will be subjected to statistical scrutiny independent of any a priori hypotheses concerning rainfall distribution, using statistical methods with the aid of a high-speed computer. This research should provide a more accurate evaluation of the apparent results of cloud seeding in the California area.

2. New York University: Dr. Max A. Woodbury of the department of mathematics is conducting a 2-year "Study of Statistical Evaluation of Weather Modification," under a $58,000 grant. Purposeful randomization of cloud-seeding experiments has been developed as a method in weather modification investigations. This study proposes to report critically on the current state of this technique, to develop new analytical procedures, and to test them as fully as possible.

OTHER FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WEATHER MODIFICATION ACTIVITIES

Federal agencies other than the National Science Foundation provide substantial support for research in atmospheric sciences, including weather modification. However, as a result of Public Law 85-510, the National Science Foundation now provides the largest measure of Government support for research on weather modification.

Department of Commerce

The U.S. Weather Bureau conducts several projects in atmospheric sciences that involve various aspects of weather modification. The National Hurricane Research Project (NHRP) performs detailed observations and analyses of hurricanes; in a few cases during the summer of 1958, experimental cloud seeding was carried on.

The physical research program under Dr. Gilbert D. Kinzer includes basic laboratory and field studies of cloud and atmospheric electricity and of droplet formation and growth, to gain a better understanding of the processes involved in the formation of precipitation. The research of Mr. Dwight B. Kline on freezing nuclei, which is supported in part by a Foundation grant, was described earlier in this report.

The Weather Bureau also furnishes precipitation recording equipment and meteorological data and advice to other weather modification research programs.

Department of the Army

The U.S. Army supports important research projects in weather modification at their research and development laboratories in Fort Monmouth, N.J. The formation and structure of clouds and precipitation and ways and means of artificially modifying them is being investigated, along with a study of the transmission of light through the atmosphere considering the influence of particulate matter suspended in the atmosphere.

Department of the Navy

The Office of Naval Research is supporting a contract at Cornell Aeronautical Laboratories to study freezing rain and the possibilities of modifying it to a less hazardous form of precipitation. Scientists at the Naval Research Laboratory are continuing Project Blackbody, a group of experiments initiated during 1958 when it was noted that cloud formations appeared to be created or destroyed within a few minutes after particles of carbon black were dispersed in selected areas and levels of the atmosphere. Obviously, this suggested that this agent may be quite effective as a weather modification tool; further research is being conducted.

The Navy is also considering proposals for the development of a small rocket for weather modification that could be launched by one man and dispense a seeding agent within a specified cloud.

Department of the Air Force

The Air Force Cambridge Research Center's Geophysics Research Directorate has several research investigations under way in which weather modification is an integral part. One applied research project deals with development of the capability of dispersing or preventing low clouds and fog at airfields.

The Air Force also conducts a very large program in contrail suppression. While condensation trails formed by high-flying aircraft are not a significant part of our weather or climate, their physical and chemical structure and the processes of formation and dispersion are undoubtedly very similar to that of clouds. Techniques for dissipation or suppression of this type of atmospheric feature may be applicable to naturally forming clouds.

Department of Agriculture

The Department of Agriculture has supported Project Skyfire for a number of years. This project is efficiently managed, and is developing a long record of exceptionally good field observations. Its principal objectives are: (1) to acquire a better understanding of the origin, characteristics, and movement of fire-setting lightning storms; and (2) to investigate the potential of cloud and weather modification techniques to eliminate or curtail the number of lightning-caused forest fires.

Department of the Interior

Another type of weather modification activity has been supported by the U.S. Geological Survey, a division for the Department of the Interior. These studies deal with evaporation modification. It is possible that evaporation can be reduced by applying a monomolecular chemical film over a water surface. If through such means one could alter significantly the amount of water going into the atmosphere, or alter the natural evaporation, it might be possible to modify the local weather.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

The interests of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in weather modification research generally arise when the research may impinge upon public health and welfare. An immediate problem concerns the types and extent of natural and manmade pollutants in the atmosphere, their variability and transport, and methods by which they may be removed. The Department actively supports weather modification research to seek means to alleviate or prevent buildup of atmospheric pollution and to supplement natural precipitation, and thereby to increase water resources for domestic, industrial, municipal, or agricultural uses.

NON-FEDERAL WEATHER MODIFICATION ACTIVITIES

State and local agencies

More than a dozen States have laws regulating the conduct of weather modification experiments and the manufacture or sale of equipment for weather modification purposes. Several States conduct or support experiments in weather modification, chiefly looking toward an increase in rainfall. The Los Angeles County Flood Control District with its own facilities is experimenting with cloud seeding to explore its potential for increasing rainfall. Other States, county, and municipal agencies carry on experiments either through their own facilities or through contracts with commercial cloud seeders.

Commercial

There are approximately 24 independent groups in the United States that deal commercially with meteorology, most of whom offer services in cloud and weather modification. During fiscal year 1959, commercial efforts to modify weather were conducted over parts of California, Colorado, Maryland, Nebraska, Oregon, Florida, Idaho, North Dakota, South Dakota, Pennsylvania, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wyoming. Five companies performed these operations in 36 separate projects.

Owing to the nature of their operations, commercial cloud-seeding and weather-modification operations have generally been deficient in scientific control and analysis. However, nearly all commercial weather-modification companies now have professional meteorologists on their staffs and show commendable interest in establishing adequate scientific controls for conducting and analyzing their operations.

Foreign

Countries other than the United States are also attempting to develop methods and techniques of weather modification, and commercial operators with offices in the United States conduct operations in Canada and Central America. For example, one U.S. cloud seeder conducted a wind-suppression project in the banana plantation portion of Panama during the summer of 1959. Experiments are also being conducted in Australia, Africa, Canada, France, Switzerland, Italy, the British Isles, the U.S.S.R., and many others. So far as is known, foreign experiments differ from the U.S. work only in details. It is apparent therefore that most of the world is aware of the need for understanding the fundamental natural processes and methods of modifying them. Many nations are carrying on research programs to achieve these goals.

A LOOK TO THE FUTURE

The conclusions of the past 10 years of experimentation emphasize that only through fundamental research in atmospheric science can answers be found to the complex questions involved in weather modification.

In 1960 and in future years, the weather modification program of the National Science Foundation will continue to support a full range of theoretical studies, laboratory research, field experimental work, and evaluation studies. Research and evaluation will be conducted by the best scientific talent using the tools of physics, chemistry, mathematics, engineering, and meteorology to solve the problems.

The research will in the main be characterized by its long-term fundamental approach, and practical results should not be anticipated until a store of new discoveries in the laboratory and in the field has accumulated.

Several seeding experiments are now based in the Western Mountain States, and additional projects can be expected to take to the field in the near future. Sound meteorological and statistical design will be emphasized.

If possible, all field research projects should continue over at least a 5- to 7-year period to minimize the problems of annual variability in precipitation. Hopefully the results will more definitely pinpoint the amount and character of precipitation increases that cloud seeding may bring in mountainous States of the West. For example, the 1958 Annual Report of Resources for the Future, Inc., estimates that an annual increase of about 15 million acre-feet of precipitation runoff might be possible through cloud seeding in the 11 Western States, which could be of tremendous value for the generation of electric power and for irrigation.

In the flatland region of Texas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Missouri, and Iowa, cumulus-type clouds are the principal rain producers during the summer growing season. The problems associated with effective seeding of the cumulus cloud and the evaluation of results in the vast flatland region are considered more difficult than those associated with west-coast seeding projects. However, the problems are not insurmountable. One or two projects will be put into the field in 1960, and some definitive answers are expected by 1965. The economic payoff—increased rainfall over the farm heartland—is apparent.

Hail damage to property and crops in the United States adds up to well over $10 million each year, and lightning and tornado damage can run the figure to hundreds of millions. Meteorologists have observed large masses of unstable supercooled cloud regions within the severe storm clouds; therefore, conditions may be good for cloud-seeding effects.

If present theory holds true, proper cloud seeding should result in more gentle rainfall and less severe storm winds, lightning, and hail. There is, however, the troublesome matter of getting the seeding material into the right part of the cloud and in sufficient quantity for efficient seeding. Two and possibly three projects will be launched during 1960 to investigate the process by which hail forms in clouds and the possibilities for its modification.

With regard to climate control, i.e., influencing the weather patterns over entire continents for a long enough period to modify seasonal climatic averages, only some general statements can be made at this time.

It is conceivable that large-scale weather control could be achieved by making small alterations in the atmosphere balance that could result in large effects, provided that the characteristics of the atmosphere can be isolated or defined closely enough to make influencing them a practical matter.

One promising path toward large-scale weather control points to changing the balance between the amount of solar heat reaching the surface and that reflected back into space. Cloud cover can greatly modify the distribution of heat and perhaps artificial clouds could be maintained over large areas. The cost would doubtless be very great.

With the advent of meteorological satellites, cloud locations will be constantly under surveillance around the world. This will not only be of assistance to the groups interested in weather modification and weather forecasting, but may well serve as an excellent tool in the direct evaluation of large-scale weather modification operations. From an overall point of view, it is certainly true that an understanding of the general circulation of the atmosphere, its secondary cyclones and smaller circulations, and the comprehensive physics of condensation and precipitation involved holds the key to the possibilities of weather modification.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Congress interested itself in weather modification as early as 1945.

In 1946 two eminent scientists, Dr. Irving Langmuir, a Nobel prize winner, and Dr. Vincent Schaefer, his assistant, both at the time with the General Electric Research Laboratories in Schenectady, N.Y., carried out the now well-known demonstration of ice crystal formation in a cold box and the historic flight over western Massachusetts. These demonstrations and their spectacular results started private operators, by adopting the principles discovered, to make it rain for a price, and the scientist to double his efforts in cloud physics and in the atmosphere sciences.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION

Congressional attention was called to the claims of private cloud seeders, many of them beyond fulfillment, and by 1951 several bills had been introduced in the House and Senate to establish Federal legislation dealing with weather modification.

After 2 years of hearings on the several bills, the bill I introduced, supported by Senator Clinton Anderson, of New Mexico and Senator Arthur Watkins, of Utah; Senator Joe O'Mahoney, of Wyoming; Senator Guy Cordon, of Oregon; Senator Warren Magnuson, of Washington and others, was passed in July 1953—Public Law 256. It established the President's Advisory Committee on Weather Control. At the close of its assignment, the Committee issued a two-volume report which is the most authentic report on weather modification in existence today.

The report was submitted to the President in December 1957. It stated that additional research was essential if satisfactory progress was to be made in this very important field. The junior Senator from South Dakota with many cosponsors, introduced a bill early in the 85th Congress to put into effect the recommendations of the Advisory Committee. Extensive hearings resulted in passage of an amended bill as Public Law 85–510. By it, the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 was amended and the work of the Advisory Committee turned over to the NSF on July 11, 1958. The report now released as "Weather Modification, Annual Report, 1959," is the first one issued by the Foundation since they were given the responsibility of carrying on work in the field of weather modification.

The records of the President's Advisory Committee on Weather Control were turned over to the National Science Foundation and gave the Foundation a launching base, upon which to build their program of research.

SOME POSITIVE, NO NEGATIVE RESULTS

One conclusion of the Advisory Committee was of particular significance to me:

For the orographic and semiorographic projects (all on the west coast) the evidence indicates that cloud seeding has produced an average increase of 10 to 15 percent in the precipitation from seeded storms. For the nonorographic projects (areas where land barriers do not exist) using the same methods, any change in precipitation could not be attributed to cloud seeding. The fact that no increase was detected does not mean there was no increase. The increase may have been so slight that it could not be measured by the statistical method used.

There was no evidence in the evaluation of any project which was intended to increase precipitation that cloud seeding had produced a detectable negative effect on precipitation.

The National Science Foundation states that the objective of its program is studying, more intensely than has been attempted before, the scientific basis of weather modification through long-term support of competent scientists working in cloud physics and allied fields. A full range of theoretical studies, along with laboratory and field experimental work, is being pursued under the direction of research physicists, chemists, mathematicians and engineers, as well as meteorologists.

The research program of the Foundation falls into four categories: planning conferences, laboratory research, field investigations and statistical evaluations.

While other Federal agencies of Government are conducting research in weather modification—the Departments of Commerce, Army, Navy, Air Force, Agriculture, Interior, and Health, Education, and Welfare—the National Science Foundation now receives the largest measure of Government support for research in this field.

An indication of the general interest in the subject is noted in that more than a dozen States now have laws regulating the conduct of weather modification experiments and that there are 24 independent groups in the United States that deal commercially with meteorology, particularly in the field of cloud and weather modification.

RESEARCH MUST GO ON

Mr. President, research in the field of weather is a longtime venture and the report of the National Science Foundation gives us a broader view of the problem, the necessity of a sound approach, and a look into the future. Research projects should be designed to continue over a 5- to 10-year period.

It is estimated that an annual increase of some 15 million acre-feet of precipitation runoff may be possible through the seeding of clouds in the 11 Western States. While the problems associated with the flatland regions are more difficult, they are not insurmountable and by 1965 we should have some answers to them, resulting in definite methods to increase precipitation in the Great Plains area. Problems associated with hail damage and methods of suppression are receiving attention.

With the National Science Foundation cooperating with State research agencies, and with private and commercial cloud seeders and their research departments, progress is being made in the field of weather forecasting and weather modification.

THE WORK OF CAPTAIN ORVILLE

Mr. President, I feel that no review of the year in the study of weather modification would be complete without a tribute to Capt. H. T. Orville, the Chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on Weather Control, who passed away May 24, 1960.

It was Captain Orville who took this skeleton of legislative authority which we provided and gave it flesh and life.

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD the notice of his death which appeared in the Washington Post of May 26, 1960.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPTAIN ORVILLE, WEATHER EXPERT

(By Patricia Sugrue)

Capt. Howard T. Orville, U.S. Navy, retired, 58, one of the leading weather experts in the United States who headed President Eisenhower's Advisory Committee on Weather Control, died Tuesday after a heart attack.

President Eisenhower chose Captain Orville to head the Weather Committee formed in 1953 in recognition of his accomplishments as a Navy meteorologist during World War II.

During its 4-year existence the Committee concentrated on a scientific appraisal of the effects of cloud-seeding operations as a method of controlling rainfall.

One of the findings of Captain Orville's Committee was that cloud seeding with silver iodide smoke produces results which are not spectacular but can be very important to the weather economy of the Nation.

Captain Orville himself believed it might be possible to control world weather conditions by using cloud-seeding techniques and foresaw a time when the United States could cause either droughts or torrential rains over the Soviet Union. Among his recommendations was a vigorous program of weather control research.

Captain Orville's pioneering work with aircraft and radar warning systems for hurricanes led to the formation of the Naval Aircraft Hurricane Evacuation Organization and the Naval Hurricane Warning Organization.

During World War II he was adviser to the Secretary of the Navy and Chief of Naval Operations on all technical and operational weather matters including forecasts for General Doolittle's raid on Tokyo and the invasion of north Africa. He was also chief forecaster for the Bikini atomic bomb tests.

Captain Orville retired from the Navy in 1953 to join the Bendix Aviation Co. in Baltimore. He moved from his home at 6232 North 23d Street, Arlington, to Long Green, Md., at that time. He was a native of Saratoga, Wyo.

He leaves his wife Lillian, three sons, Howard T., Jr., of Bristol, Va., Harold, of Tucson, Ariz., and Richard E., of the home, and a brother Harold of Santa Monica, Calif.

Funeral services will be held 11 a.m., Friday, in the Trinity Episcopal Church, Long Green. Burial will be in Arlington Cemetery at 2 p.m.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President in retrospect, it hardly seems possible that it was only 7 years ago when Congress passed S. 86 August 13, 1953, which established the Advisory Committee on Weather Control. The results of their work under the leadership of Capt. Orville and Dean A. M. Eberle, the vice chairman, was far reaching. It laid the groundwork for the passage of Public Law 85–510 in 1957, which transferred the work of the Committee to a permanent agency of Government the National Science Foundation. The two-volume report of the Advisory Committee on Weather Control put a new emphasis on weather modification operations for increasing precipitation and for suppressing hail. The Committee pointed out in their report that weather modification is feasible and that rain can be increased under certain conditions. In the mountainous areas, where updrafts occur, precipitation has been increased from 10 to 15 percent by the seeding of winter-type storm clouds. The Committee was firm in the conviction that further research is needed, not only in the mountainous areas of this country but also in the vast flatlands, where is found entirely different atmospheric conditions. Here both basic and applied research is needed.

INSTITUTE OF ATMOSPHERIC PHYSICS

Topographically and climatologically, my State of South Dakota is favorably situated as a base for much of this research. In other words, South Dakota is ideally located to serve as a base for an extensive atmospheric laboratory where investigations of wide scope could be carried out. This type of study is complex and it is important that it be carried out under the most favorable circumstances. The atmosphere has many variables and these must be studied individually or in groups, while other uncontrollable parameters are observed. I believe conditions for carrying out atmospheric research are most favorable in South Dakota. The Black Hills provide an isolated platform in the Great Plains for sampling and monitoring atmospheric constituents and for observing atmospheric behavior. The Black Hills also create and reintensify cloud and storm systems in a fixed locale.

Believing that this area could well be designated for basic research efforts I have encouraged the School of Mines and Technology at Rapid City in its efforts to establish an Institute of Atmospheric Sciences, approved by the board of regents, as a research and teaching division of the school.

There are plans to expand and develop it as fast as funds become available. We are hoping that the National Science Foundation will consider this location important to their total research effort and supply some of the funds necessary to establish and operate it and give it counsel and direction from time to time.

Now, Mr. President, in concluding, as a further evidence of the far-reaching possibilities in the field of weather modification and of the immeasurable contributions to it by Capt. H. T. Orville, the former Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Weather Control, I ask consent to insert at this point excerpts from his address before the northern California branch of the American Meteorological Society last November. The address was given under the heading "My Crystal Ball."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY CRYSTAL BALL—TEN YEARS AHEAD IN METEOROLOGY

(By Capt. H. T. Orville, U.S. Navy, retired, vice president, Beckman & Whitney)

The next 10 years hold promise of being the most productive in the history of meteorology. Research which is just being started and plans for new tools and facilities will make it possible to examine in much greater detail fronts, thunderstorms, tornadoes, and hurricanes. When it becomes routine to observe continuously the entire life cycle of a hurricane during its 10 to 14 days' history (and this will be possible in a few years) then our understanding of these destructive storms will permit forecasts and warnings in greater detail, for periods of 72 to 96 hours.

Similar improvements can be expected in the daily forecasts of routine weather conditions. A forecast will read "light to moderate rain beginning at 9:35 a.m. and ending in showers by 4:48 p.m.," and the forecast will be verified. There will be no reason for missed forecasts.

Three-dimensional continuous night and day observations will permit constant scrutiny of movements, changes, and trends of all weather conditions approaching the forecast area during the 24- to 48-hour period for which the forecast is made.

One of the greatest achievements will be the issuance of accurate warnings of impending severe weather in time to take precautionary measures to save lives and drastically reduce property damage caused by severe storms. (Two years ago the East experienced five severe ice storms or blizzards and not one was forecast. Loss of life and heavy property damage resulted.)

More efficient methods of increasing precipitation, of clearing airports of fog, and of suppressing lightning and hail are certain to be developed in the next 10 years. Although financial support for cloud-physics research is increasing, the present program is far too small to meet the urgency of present giant strides being made by U.S.S.R. in all scientific endeavors, including weather modification.

Progress in our understanding of atmospheric sciences during the next 10 years will far exceed all advances made in the past 60 years.

Within the next 10 years then, it is not unreasonable to expect that meteorology will have attained the following objectives, primarily because of greatly increased knowledge of atmospheric processes:

Day-to-day forecasts to the public 99 percent accurate with specific times for beginning and ending of rain or snow. Adequate advance warning of severe storms, floods, hurricanes, and tornadoes. Reasonably accurate long-range forecasts for 3 months ahead.

Precise knowledge of jet streams, and their relation to hurricanes and tornadoes and other severe storms to permit accurate forecasts of location, time of occurrence, and intensity.

Sufficient understanding of weather processes to use weather modification to clear airports of fog, to alleviate droughts, to increase precipitation substantially, and to eliminate hail and lightning damage. Possibly a successful breakthrough to permit control of hurricane intensity or diversion from tracks which would threaten populous areas. Large-scale weather-control measures should be attained within the next 20 years. We will, by this time, have reached the point in international affairs where a world community of friendship and understanding is vital to our survival.

Large-scale weather-control measures would deeply affect the atmosphere's general circulation, which depends on the earth's rotation and intensive solar heating of the tropics. Measures in the Arctic may control the weather in the middle latitudes, or measures in Siberia might critically affect the weather in North America. All this will most certainly merge each nation's affairs with those of every other.

That the Soviets will be the first to achieve success in weather control seems clearly indicated by recent events and their accomplishments during the past 2 years.

Complete understanding of air pollution problems with effective methods of control in large industrial areas. This means that Los Angeles, Cincinnati, San Francisco, and other populous areas will no longer be plagued with air pollution problems.

PERMISSION FOR SENATOR SCOTT TO BE RECOGNIZED IMMEDIATELY AFTER ADDRESS OF SENATOR HARTKE

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized immediately after the conclusion of the address by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] is now recognized.

THE U–2 INCIDENT

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, at the conclusion of the hearings on the U–2 incident, together with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], I filed a separate statement. The conclusions reached in that statement were subscribed to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS].

I should like at this time to discuss the context of that statement, dealing with the U–2 incident of May 1. In the statement, the No. 1 conclusion was as follows:

The Congress of the United States has appropriated for a number of years the moneys that were needed for the development and operation of planes capable of reaching high altitudes and gathering information required as a guide for the evolvement in our country of defenses for national security. The Members of the Congress who have been responsible for reviewing the details of our intelligence-gathering activities knew of these flights and approved of them.

In connection with the first finding, it is clear that in 1954 those in charge of our national defense concluded that we were inadequately securing intelligence about the development of the military power of the Soviet, and it was at that time suggested that there be developed a light one-motored aircraft that would reach high altitudes for the purpose of gaining intelligence. That information was communicated to the Congress.

The Congress in general was not apprised of the fact, but the leaders were, and it was understood that intensive efforts would be applied to the development of the type of plane which I have just described.

In 1955 there was a summit conference. President Eisenhower in that conference partly, as a purpose for avoiding the use of the plane, suggested that there be an agreement reached with the Soviet under which the planes of the Soviet would have open skies over the United States and the planes of the United States would have open skies over the Soviet.

That proposal of the President was rejected by Khrushchev. We proceeded with the development of the plane.

In 1956 the President, still hoping that there might be some agreement reached about the reciprocal and mutual gathering of information, proposed that there be an exchange of observers between the Soviet and the United States That proposal contemplated that Soviet observers would come to our country, and our observers would go to the Soviet. The proposal was rejected by Khrushchev.

I point out these facts to show how intensive has been the purpose of our country to open its doors to Russian planes and Russian observers so that the Soviets would know what we were doing militarily, and, on the contrary, to point out how adamant the Soviet was in refusing to subscribe to that plan.

Then came 1956, when the U–2 was available to make its first flight. The flight was made in 1956. There is evidence that the Soviet Union knew the flight in 1956 went over its land. In 1957, in 1958, in 1959, and in 1960 these flights were being made over the Soviet Union.

There may be some question about whether the Soviet Union knew of the presence of those planes. In the Paris press conference Khrushchev stated that when he was at Camp David in September of 1959 he knew the planes were flying over, and he was asked at the Paris conference, "Why did you not say something to Eisenhower about it?" He gave some slippery answer to that question.

The planes continued to make the flights following the Camp David talks. The flights continued in the early part of 1960.

If the people of the Nation, when the May 1 failure occurred, believed that these flights were not made with the authority of Congress, they were completely mistaken. The Congress authorized the development of the plane. The Congress provided the money for the flights of the plane. Therefore, the judgment must inevitably be drawn that we believed for our national security these flights had to be made, facing the fact that the Soviet Union refused to enter into any agreement under which the United States and the Soviet would each be able to know what the other was doing militarily.

The second conclusion reached, based upon the testimony offered, was:

The U–2's have been operating successfully for a period of 4 years, and during that time have obtained information indispensable to the preparation of an adequate national defense.

Without the information acquired by the U–2 operations, in my opinion, the present military posture of the United States would positively have been less capable of meeting the Soviet military power.

I cannot describe the pictures taken. There were many of them. Khrushchev knows that there were many of them. Part of his irascibility is the product of the fact that these planes were flying over the land, that he knew about it, and could do nothing about it.

The pictures to me were encouraging and discouraging. They were encouraging because they showed to me that we were alert and that we did wish to know what was the military strength of the Soviet Union. On the other hand, they were discouraging. The discouragement came from the fact that there was a revelation of military development which caused me to become gravely concerned about the military security of our country.

Third:

When Premier Khrushchev left Moscow on Saturday, May 14, instead of Sunday, May 15, his previously declared date of departure, he had already decided not to participate in the conference.

This decision was based on Khrushchev's conviction that the allied powers could not be divided at the summit, and that because of allied unity he would not be able to accomplish his objectives at the conference. Thus, while the U–2 incident gave him an excuse for wrecking the conference, it was not the cause why he chose to do so.

At the time of his departure from Moscow on May 14, he carried with him as a precondition to the Soviet's participation in the meeting, an ultimatum to be made upon the President of the United States which he knew the President could not accept.

It is interesting to observe the development of what took place prior to Khrushchev's departure from Moscow on Saturday, May 14, and his arrival in Paris on Saturday, May 14. He was supposed to come to Paris on Sunday, May 15. He suddenly announced that he would be there one day ahead of time. His whole entourage went with him. They came to Paris Saturday afternoon, May 14, and that very afternoon asked for an appointment with De Gaulle, to be held at 11 o'clock on Sunday morning. The appointment was granted. Marshal Malinovsky and Foreign Minister Gromyko, with Khrushchev, went to see De Gaulle. There they met. The ultimatum was laid before De Gaulle. It was written in French. That ultimatum made four demands as a prerequisite to the holding of the conference.

That morning the call was made upon Macmillan. An appointment was desired with Macmillan. The appointment was granted. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, May 15, the meeting was had with Macmillan. The same ultimatum was delivered to him.

What was this ultimatum about which I speak? These were the four conditions laid down by Khrushchev as a prerequisite to the holding of the conference:

First, he demanded of President Eisenhower that he denounce the overflights.

Second, that the President apologize to the Soviet Union.

Third, that the President punish those directly responsible.

Fourth, that the President promise not to repeat these flights.

Khrushchev knew that the President could not accept those conditions, and though he knew it, he did not announce the conditions in Moscow, but went to Paris one day ahead of time, and in the early morning on Sunday met with De Gaulle and at 4 o'clock in the afternoon with Macmillan. One might ask, Why did Khrushchev go to Paris to deliver the ultimatum? There were 3,000 newspapermen in Paris. He concluded that this was the place the ultimatum should be delivered.

My conclusion has been, and it has been corroborated, that when Khrushchev left Moscow he knew there would be no conference and he did not wish a conference to be held.

But there is a further aspect of this attitude of Khrushchev that is worthy of examination. He was invited to the United States by President Eisenhower. Our people accorded him a hospitality which in truth, in my opinion, he was not entitled to. I urged, among those whom I could influence, that we be restrained and that we be hospitable to him during his visit. He was received hospitably everywhere he went. Our people were good to him while he was here, and I am sure that among Senators there was grave apprehension that something wrong might happen. There was apprehension because we did not want the world to think that we had not given him adequate protection while he was in our country.

He was here last summer. He returned to Russia. By November he began to repeat the attacks which he had been making for a year prior thereto. These attacks were signs that he was getting a bit cool toward the summit conference.

I wish to repeat what he started to do. On November 11 he bitterly and vigorously denounced the building of a broadcasting station in West Berlin. On November 14 he delivered a speech in which, in a vigorous and lacerating tone, he denounced Adenauer and the German Federal Republic. In that same speech he boasted about the missile power of the Soviet, intending, I suppose, to let Adenauer know that the missiles were hanging over Adenauer's head.

Subsequently, on December 1, the Soviet began repeating through Khrushchev their threats to sign a separate peace treaty with East Germany. He repeated these threats of signing a separate peace treaty with Germany to the Supreme Soviet on January 14. He went to Indonesia and said he would sign a separate peace treaty. At Baku on April 25 he made his vituperative attacks and his threat to sign a separate peace treaty.

Then he procured the Communist bloc of satellite nations to declare that they would sign a separate peace treaty.

To what did that return? The threat to make that signature occurred 1 year earlier, and here he repeatedly made those threats. While I do not think the conclusion can be reached, there were, however, evidences as early as November 1959, running down through his speech at Baku on April 25, that he was growing weary of the summit conference. There cannot, however, be any doubt about the fact that when he left Moscow, he did not contemplate that the conference would be held.

The Soviet Union has the largest espionage organization of any nation in the world, and possibly the largest in history. The activities of this organization which are carried on in this country and elsewhere were not suspended on May 1 or prior to May 1 or at any period preceding the summit meeting.

I wish to read from an exposé of Soviet espionage issued by J. Edgar Hoover in May 1960. I ask Senators to listen, because while we throw the cape of blackness upon our country because of the May 1 incident, we do not say one word about what the Soviet has been doing ever since its organization in 1917.

I. INTRODUCTION

Recent Soviet propaganda has denounced the United States for aerial reconnaissance of the Soviet Union in terms designed to convince the world that the U.S.S.R. would not stoop to espionage. In discussing this subject and the reception which President Eisenhower might expect on his visit to Russia, Premier Khrushchev was quoted in the newspapers on May 11, 1960, as wondering what would have been the reaction of the American people if the Russians had sent a plane over the United States on the eve of his visit to this country.

I regret to point out that a part of what Khrushchev said has been said on the floor of the Senate in justification of the criticism that has been directed at the May 1 flight.

What are the facts?

The facts are that at the very time Premier Khrushchev was advancing to the podium to speak before the United Nations General Assembly on September 18, 1959, two Soviet espionage agents were cautiously surveying a street corner in Springfield, Mass., in preparation for a clandestine meeting with an American whom they were attempting to subvert. At the very time that Khrushchev was declaring that a means must be found to stop mankind from backsliding into an abyss of war, Vadim A. Kirilyuk, Soviet employee of the United Nations, was attempting to induce this American to furnish information regarding U.S. cryptographic machines and to secure employment in a vital U.S. Government agency where he could obtain classified information for the Russians. While this meeting was taking place Kirilyuk and the American were under observation by Leonid A. Kovalev, another Soviet employee of the United Nations who was conducting a countersurveillance. Unknown to the Russians, however, this meeting was also being observed by special agents of the FBI who obtained photographs of the Russians.

Not only did these Russians stoop to spying, but they callously abused their status as guests of this country to spy in the most reprehensible manner—the subversion of an American on American soil.

I should like to read further from the report:

Although FBI agents observed this meeting and photographed the Russians, no publicity was given to this incident in view of the negotiations which were then in progress. This incident, as contrasted with the recent handling of the plane incident by the Russians, gives ample testimony as to which country is acting in good faith in trying to maintain world peace.

And this is not an isolated incident—nor has the target always been so limited. The facts are that Soviet agents for three decades have engaged in extensive espionage against this country, and through the years have procured a volume of information which would stagger the imagination. This information includes literally dozens of aerial photographs of major U.S. cities and vital areas which have given the Russians the product of aerial reconnaissance just as surely as if Soviet planes had been sent over this country.

2. ACQUISITION OF AERIAL PHOTOGRAPHS

In a free country such things as aerial photographs are available to the public and can be purchased commercially. The Soviets have been fully aware of this and throughout the years have taken full advantage of this free information, collecting aerial photographs of many areas of the United States.

For example, during October 1953, two Soviet officials visited Minneapolis where they purchased 15 aerial photographs of Minneapolis and St. Paul. In October and November 1953, two Soviets traveled in Missouri and Texas and obtained aerial maps of Dallas, Tulsa, Fort Worth and the surrounding areas covering a naval air station, an Army airfield, and an Air Force base. In April 1954, a Soviet official purchased aerial photographs of five Long Island communities. Also, in April 1954, a Soviet official purchased three aerial photographs of Boston, Mass., and Newport, R.I., areas. In May 1954, three Soviets traveled to California where they ordered from a Los Angeles photography shop $80 worth of aerial photographs covering the Los Angeles area.

However, they have not been content with acquisition of publicly available data. For example, on May 3, 1954, Leonid E. Pivnev, an assistant Soviet air attaché stationed in Washington, who had previously traveled extensively throughout the United States and had obtained commercially available aerial photographs of various areas of this country, requested a Washington D.C., photographer to rent an airplane to take photographs of New York City which were not commercially available. He specified the scale to be used and the altitude from which the photographs were to be taken. He offered $700 for this activity. Obviously the photographs which he requested would depict vital port areas, industrial facilities, and military installations in the New York area.

For this brazen abuse of his diplomatic privileges Pivnev was declared persona non grata on May 29, 1954, and departed from this country on June 6, 1954.

But this did not stop the Soviets. They continued their systematic program of collecting aerial photographs of major cities and vital areas of the United States. On January 19, 1955, the State Department sent a note to the Soviet Ambassador placing restrictions on the acquisition of certain types of data by Soviet citizens in the United States. These restrictions were comparable to restrictions on American citizens in Russia and in part prohibited Soviet citizens from obtaining aerial photographs except where they "appear in or are appendixes to newspapers, periodicals, technical journals, atlases and books commercially available to the general public."

Soviet reaction to the restrictions was typical of their philosophy. They began circumventing the restrictions by subverting Americans to purchase aerial photographs for them. One month after the restrictions became effective, Nikolai I. Trofimov, a Soviet official in Mexico, began negotiations for a resident of the west coast of the United States to obtain aerial photographs of 45 major U.S. cities. Nineteen of these cities are located near Strategic Air Command bases. The remaining 26 are all strategic cities in or near which are located airbases, naval bases, research or training stations, atomic energy installations or important industrial facilities.

During April 1958, Vladimir D. Loginov, a Soviet employee of the United Nations used the same technique to obtain an aerial map of New York City. At 10 p.m. on April 26, 1958, Loginov secretly met an individual in a darkened parking lot at the railroad station in Scarsdale, N.Y., where this map was delivered to Loginov. Months later on November 15, 1958, this same parking lot was again utilized by the Soviets to obtain aerial photographs of Chicago, Ill. On this occasion, the photographs were turned over to Kirill S. Doronkin, another Soviet employee of the United Nations. In this same operation, the Soviets attempted to obtain aerial photographs of Portland, Oreg.; Seattle, Wash.; and San Diego and San Francisco, Calif.

Now we are condemned, and upon us is placed the mantle of shame. But not one word is said about the activities of the Soviet in respect to its espoinage activities. There is no excuse for it. I regret very much that the hearings which were conducted were practically devoid of any attempt to demonstrate in the public record what the Soviet was doing. In effect, we placed the crown of glory upon the head of Khrushchev, and the mantle of blame and darkness upon the shoulders of our country. I simply cannot subscribe to it. No one can tell me that the Soviet in its conduct for 30 years and in its conduct this year has demeaned itself in a manner that commands respect and in a manner that indicates it wants peace. It is being made to appear that because of the May 1 incident we have done something that has never been done before by way of trespass.

Fifth. Those who launched the May 1 flight knew that these flights had a previous record for almost 4 years of unbroken success and they had no reason to assume that this flight would be any different from its predecessors. They were aware that there was almost always a diplomatic reason for not sending flights at a particular time and that if these reasons were made overriding, it would be difficult to find any time when such flights could be sent. They knew of the enormous value to the national security of these flights. These were the facts which had to be taken into account in deciding whether or not the flight should be launched.

Of course, if the failure of the May 1 flight could have been expected and foreseen, then the flight should not have been dispatched. This would hold true, too, for all the previous flights. But the fact is that when the May 1 flight started on its journey, every past experience justified the conclusion that it would not fail.

With the benefit of hindsight, no criticisms have been made against the flights which did not fail, but only against the May 1 flight has the condemnation been issued.

Mr. President, I should like to examine that aspect of the problem for a moment. Is it not odd that in the meetings which we had, and in the reports which have been filed, not one word of criticism was directed at the many, many flights which were made between July 12, 1956, and May 1, 1960? All of those flights are approved. They are approved because they succeeded. Only the May 1 flight is denounced. It is denounced because it failed. I submit that the matter of failure or success of the flight is not the standard by which the rightness or wrongness of the flight should be determined.

It is said that the May 1 flight should not have been dispatched. A flight took place on April 9. Khrushchev knew about it. He said nothing about it. If the May 1 flight was wrong, was the April 9 flight wrong? I cannot reconcile my thinking to the proposition that there is rationalization in the position taken that all the flights were sound except the May 1 flight. If the May 1 flight should not have been dispatched, when should the cutoff date have occurred? Was it April 9? Was it last September, when Khrushchev was in the United States? Was it prior to last September, when discussions were being had about inviting Khrushchev to the United States? There may be differences of opinion on this point, but those to whom the security of our country was entrusted—the military personnel, the persons charged with the acquisition of intelligence—recognize that such flights could not be suspended every time Khrushchev began speaking out of one side of his mouth for peace, and by deed was preparing for war.

What if the April 9 flight had failed? Then that one would have been condemned. What if a flight had failed in February? That one would have been condemned. Therefore, I say that the judgment that the May 1 flight should not have been dispatched is predicated upon hindsight. I have had enough experience to know how easy it is to be a Monday morning quarterback or a Monday morning coach, and how different it is to have responsibility and to make judgments prior to the actual crystallization of the facts.

Sixth. The May 1 flight having failed, the representatives of the State Department, Defense Department, and NASA—the National Aeronautics and Space Administration—neglected, in my opinion, to sufficiently coordinate the information which they gave to the public respecting the mission.

There was great consternation and much confusion. Newspapermen descended upon Dryden at NASA. They were at the State Department. They were at the Defense Department. They were at Hagerty's office. There was no coordination about how the information on the flight would be released.

I believe I understand how that occurred. Mr. Dryden is a scientist—a scientist of extraordinary ability. He is not accustomed to dealing with newspapermen. He is a college professor. The newspapermen descended upon him in swarms. He issued a release which was not coordinated with those of the other departments. That is my analysis of how the failure to coordinate occurred.

Seventh. Conditions following the May 1 flight having developed as they did, it became unavoidable and imperative for the President to make a statement with regard to it. If he had to make a statement, he had to state the truth.

It has been stated that no one asked that he lie. It has been suggested that he should have remained silent. I do not know about that. There may be two views to be drawn. However, the ones who state that he should have remained silent can be no more positive about the correctness of their advice than I am positive about the advice that the President should have spoken, and that when he spoke, he was required to tell the truth.

There is one aspect of this problem which we ought to ponder. The President of the United States is the head of the National Security Council. In that department is the agency burdened with the responsibility of coordinating intelligence. If the President performs his duty, he is supposed to know what is taking place by way of espionage and intelligence. As he said, that is a distasteful, unsavory occupation at best. However, let us remember that it has been done from time immemorial. I do not know what I would want to do. Would I want to know what was taking place? If I were asked that question, and knew the answer, I would either have to lie or remain silent. If I did not know, and allowed the agency to operate by itself, and if something then went wrong, I would be charged with not having adequately supervised the agency.

I commend the President for having stated that in the interest of national security these flights had to be made. I do not believe there is any member of the committee who will challenge that statement. I would feel tremendously less confident if I were of the belief that we would not attempt to find out what the Soviet is doing. Representatives of the Soviet Union can come to our country, walk down the streets, hire private airplanes, and do all the spying they want to do.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has had pending before it a bill to restore to the Secretary of State some control over the issuance of passports to Communists. The bill has been in committee for 2 years, but nothing has been done about it. In 1959, the head of the Communist Party came before our committee and opposed the passage of the bill. I do not mean to say that we have held up action on the bill because of that request; I merely want it to be clear that the head of the Communist Party of the United States can come to the Committee on Foreign Relations of our country and say, "Don't bar Communists from going back to Russia. If you do, you will violate the morality and the constitutional right of free travel."

Mr. President, we have allowed Communists to move about at will in a free country, unrestrained. They may go wherever they wish to go and acquire information. Yet we are condemned before the world, not by the Communists, but by our own people back home. I do not think it is right.

The time has come to assert ourselves in behalf of our country—criticize it, of course, when it is wrong. But I cannot help but think of the words of Decatur:

> Our country. In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong.

I am not going to rejoice when a mistake is made. I am not going to proclaim that mistake throughout the world, especially if that does not serve the security and the future life of my Nation.

Eighth. The gathering of intelligence has been practiced by nations from time immemorial, and though it is an unsavory and a hateful occupation, its omission, Mr. President, would come fairly close to constituting criminal negligence in respect to the responsibility of a nation to provide for its common defense.

Mr. President, on the floor of the Senate I propounded 12 questions to be answered by the State Department. Those questions are:

First. To what extent has the Soviet Union been spying in the United States, West Germany, and other nations?

Second. How many times has the Soviet Union breached its commitments to other nations in the world—especially the captive nations?

Third. Is there a difference between spying by foot on land, on the one hand, and by plane in the air, on the other?

Fourth. Is it in the interest of our country that we abandon the general and traditional methods of acquiring intelligence?

Fifth. If we do so, what are the probabilities of the Soviet Union's following a similar course?

Sixth. Why did the Communists break their treaty with the Poles in World War II and stab the Poles in the back while the latter were fighting the Nazis?

Seventh. What are the details concerning the brutal massacre of Polish soldiers by the Communists in the Katyn forests?

Eighth. Why, in World War II, did the Reds, while advancing westward and nearing Poland, induce the Polish people of Warsaw to heroically rebel against the Nazi occupiers, and then abandon them to slaughter by the Nazis?

Ninth. Why did the Soviet break its pledged word that the people of the satellite nations, under free and open elections, would be permitted to choose the type of government they wanted?

Tenth. Why did the Soviet aid and induce the Red Chinese to use their military power against South Korea, resulting in death and injury to thousands of American boys?

Eleventh. Why did the Soviet encourage the Red Chinese in the bombardment and killing of innocent people at the Quemoy and Matsu Islands?

Twelfth. What is the explanation for the mass and merciless murder of the freedom fighters of Hungary, Poland, and East Germany, who were fighting for liberation in those respective countries?

I realize that those questions are rhetorical. But I wanted them answered, so that the attention of those who are condemning our country might be called to the necessity to present the entire picture.

The May 1 incident cannot be judged as an isolated one. It must be put into the framework of all that has happened since Korea, at least.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I recognize that the Senator from Ohio is speaking in limited time, so I shall not question him at length.

Certainly the Senator from Ohio has rendered a great service in putting certain things in perspective. I hope his speech will receive wide reading throughout the country.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. I commend the Senator from Ohio. I was much interested in the various points he made, especially when he explained so clearly why the President of the United States had to take the responsibility for that incident.

If he had not done so, if he had remained silent, or if he had said he knew nothing about the matter, would not there have been great criticism, both in this country and throughout the rest of the free world, in regard to permitting such a thing or not knowing about it? Did not he take the only honorable course which could have been taken?

Mr. LAUSCHE. He took the course that I would have taken. But if I had not agreed with him, I would not have used that as a basis for demeaning my country and elevating the Soviets.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, it has been my privilege to serve with the Senator from Ohio on the Foreign Relations Committee. As the record will show, he and I joined in what might be called a minority report. But in order that the record may be clear, I wish to state that, for weeks, what was the worksheet had been worked over, until finally a number of Republican colleagues joined in regard to it. But then they also joined with the distinguished Senator from Ohio and myself in what might be called the minority report, which he has so ably discussed.

I am sorry I was delayed, and could not be in the Chamber in time to hear the able Senator's discussion of the other points.

But I wish to state that I realize that he has been a judge; and his service on the committee is particularly valuable because he thinks straight and states his thoughts in words which anyone can understand; and then—as he has indicated so well today—he very emphatically presents the conclusions he was reached.

I like the way his mind works. It is clear. In my opinion, his ideas are expressed very clearly. There is no fog in them.

I shall read with much profit what he has said today, because it will recall to my mind many of the arguments we had in the committee, when he and I were in absolute agreement. We felt that the issue involved was not one of politics in its narrow sense or in its partisan sense, but that it was one in which the very safety of our country was involved.

His clear thinking on that subject has so greatly impressed me, that all I can say now is, "Senator, thank you. You are doing a grand job."

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I regret very much that I was unable to be in the Chamber during the entire speech of the Senator from Ohio.

I wish to address this question to him: We hear so many times today, that if we do not do this or that, or if we do not give all the money we have in the Treasury to people abroad, they will turn to communism.

In the context of the statement the Senator has made and in view of the captivity of hundreds of millions of people behind the Iron Curtain, is it not hard to believe that any sensible people would turn to such a system even under the most dire circumstances?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have some definite views on that subject. No one can convince me that the people of the captive nations subscribe to the Communist philosophy. My parents came from Slovenia, and I have relatives who are supposed to be in the Communist country of Tito. But I know the soul of those people, and I know that they long for freedom of expression and worship and speech and the rights and the justice we have in our country just as dearly as does the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], whose ancestors probably had been in this country for decades before mine. And I think I know the soul of the Polish people, and the Hungarians, and the Slovaks, and the Latvians, and the Lithuanians, and the Estonians, and the Rumanians, and the others.

On the east, the Soviets have captured nations that are waiting to rise. The assertion that they are Communists cannot be accepted by me. Then, going into Russia itself, the Azerbaijans and the Ukrainians are not Communists. Forty million Ukrainians will rise the very first chance they get.

I cannot believe, except by subversion or mass demonstration, by a very small minority taking over a large group, that the communistic philosophy would spread.

If the Senator from Maryland will be patient for another moment only, we talk about our troubles. What about the troubles of the Soviet with the captive nations and with people living within its own boundaries, including the Russian people? And what about Russia's problem with Red China? Certainly, we have problems, but let us not tell the whole world that the Soviet is dominant, triumphant, reeling over the free people, and changing people to the Communist philosophy, when that is not the fact.

Mr. BUTLER. And may I say to the Senator that, in my opinion, the ancestors of the Senator from Ohio and the other good people he has been referring to could not be bought with millions of dollars.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think that is so. I do not mean by my statement to say we can dispense with helping the impoverished people of the world who are being exploited or who are sought to be exploited. We must give them help. While there has been misadministration in our foreign aid program, we cannot abandon it.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not suggest that we abandon it. The Senator knows I have consistently voted for the program in one form or another.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. But I think we put too much emphasis on the dollar for gaining friendships, rather than displaying the true character of the American people by forthright and fearless action.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I regret to say it, but I think we place too much value on the dollar in many other instances.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. First, may I express my appreciation to the Senator from Ohio for his magnificent address this afternoon. I heard a good deal of the testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations, but not all of it. Everything the Senator from Ohio has said is absolutely correct, in my judgment, and a sound deduction from the testimony so far as I heard it. I think the Senator from Ohio has made a great contribution to the understanding of the country on this particular issue.

The Senator from Ohio and I do not always agree in our conclusions or judgment about the action which should be taken, but even when we disagree—and in this instance we do not disagree—my own understanding has always been greatly assisted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to join the other Senators who have thanked the able Senator from Ohio for his very fine speech. He has rendered a great service to the Senate and the country today by presenting a comprehensive record of the facts surrounding the U–2 flights; he has brought into focus the basic reason for the flights—the security of the nation. And he has insisted rightly that the failure of the May 1 flight ought not to be used to disparage the United States.

I do not say I can add a great deal to his discussion of this incident. The chief reason why I rose yesterday and do so now is, because of my responsibility as a Member of the Senate, I felt it was my duty to attend the hearings. I attended every one of the hearings with the exception of the first day, when Mr. Herter testified. I heard the other witnesses testify, and I saw the photographs which had been taken from a U–2 plane. I have read carefully the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the statements made by its chairman, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the fine speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and other Senators.

Because of my attendance on the hearings, I came to the conclusion that too little emphasis was given in the committee report to the reasons which led to the approval of the system of flights.

As the Senator has so clearly explained, because our society is completely open and the Russian society closed, because of the uncertainty of Soviet intentions, the President of the United States—and it is his solemn responsibility—approved the flights to protect the very life and freedom of this country.

One can wonder whether the particular flight on May 1 was necessary.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Surely; I agree with that statement.

Mr. COOPER. But I agree with the Senator that if the plane had gone down on the April 9 flight, or 6 months before, the same principles would have been involved, and we could have expected the same reaction from the Soviet Union.

I agree with the Senator that the statements made after May 1 could have been better managed; but beyond this arguable point, I agree with him that the President of the United States expressed the best in our country and the best in himself when he told the truth. Would we be proud of him and of our country if he had told a lie? I do not think so.

We have heard a great deal about the loss of prestige of the United States over this incident. But no one in the Senate will say the flights should not have been made, because they were necessary for the security of this country.

The Senator from Ohio is a great and patriotic man. He has expressed his own character, and the best of our country, on the floor of the Senate today.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut in just a moment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the 12 questions which I put to the State Department and the answers which they gave.

There being no objection, the questions and answers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Question 1. To what extent has the Soviet Union been spying in the United States, West Germany, and other nations?

In recent years there has been continued evidence of the extensive nature of Soviet espionage in the United States, West Germany and other nations. The manner in which the Soviet espionage system functions abroad has been clearly set forth in the findings of the Royal Commissions in Canada and Australia which were set up as a result of the Guzenko and Petrov defections. These commissions established that there was not 1 but at least 3 parallel Soviet intelligence networks operating in Soviet missions abroad: military, state security and party. To these may also be added naval and commercial intelligence networks. The activities of 11 Soviet officials expelled from the United States since 1953 are described in the attached document, which was presented to the United Nations by Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge on May 24, 1960.

So far as the espionage activities of nonofficial Soviet personnel in the United States are concerned, the case of Colonel Rudolph Ivanovich Abel provides a good example of this type of activity. Colonel Abel was convicted by a Federal jury in New York on October 25, 1957, for conspiring to steal United States defense secrets for the Soviet Union. Abel, a veteran of the Soviet intelligence service, had entered the United States in 1948 under false documents as a United States citizen, Andrew Kayotis. While here he also used the name Emil Goldfus for which he had false documents and also documents for a mythical Martin Collins. During his years in the United States and before his exposure Abel used a photographer's studio on Fulton Street in Brooklyn as a front from which he operated.

Methods used by Abel and an accomplice, Reino Hayhanen, were ingenious. In order to contact his superiors, Hayhanen would place chalk marks at various predesignated points. To minimize personal contacts and subsequent danger of compromise by surveillances, a system of widely separated "dead drops" and "banks" was established throughout the metropolitan area of New York. Abel was also a specialist in artifacts. In his "photographic studio" at the time of his arrest were found both the tools and the devices he fashioned for passing messages: hollowed-out coins, bolts, jewelry, magnetic containers, and other objects in which could be inserted film containing code or plain text messages and other material for transmittal.

American citizens recruited by Soviet espionage agents include Julius Rosenberg, Ethel Rosenberg, David Greenglass, Abraham Brothman, Miriam Moskowitz, Morton Sobell, Harry Gold, Kurt Ponder, Otto Verber, Jack Soble, Myra Soble, Jacob Albam, and others.

So far as Soviet espionage in West Germany is concerned, a spokesman of the Federal German Republic issued a statement on May 13, 1960, briefly describing the scale on which the Soviet Union and other Communist countries practice espionage within the territory of the Federal Republic and West Berlin. The bulletin of the German Federal Government of May 17, 1960, describes this announcement as follows:

"The spokesman announced that between August 30, 1951, and December 31, 1959, more than 18,000 agents of the Soviet bloc were apprehended in the Federal Republic and West Berlin. Of these, 1,700 were given prison sentences; about 16,500 were acquitted because of duress, genuine repentance, or voluntary and timely confession. All these agents confessed to having had orders to carry out espionage in the Federal Republic or in West Berlin.

"Exact information was given about the authority from which these agents received their orders. Of the agents apprehended in 1959, fully 2,325 admitted having worked for the espionage service of the Soviet-occupied zone of Germany, 264 named the Soviet Union as the country from which they had received their orders and 462 admitted having received orders from other East-bloc countries. The corresponding figures for 1958 are: Soviet Zone, 366; Soviet Union, 204; other Communist countries, 236.

"In the first quarter of 1960 alone, 588 self-confessed agents of the Communist bloc have been apprehended.

"The extent of Communist espionage activities in the Federal Republic and West Berlin alone, and the increase in these activities of late, is evident from these figures. To this must be added that these agents, according to their own confessions, had in each case fulfilled more than one espionage mission. The 264 agents of the Soviet Union apprehended in 1959 had carried out a total of 790 single missions; the 2,325 Soviet Zone agents of the same year had completed a total of 8,234 missions.

"According to painstaking analysis by the German authorities, the Communist countries maintain about 16,000 agents on the soil of the Federal Republic and West Berlin, in spite of an annual loss of 2,400 to 2,800 such agents. These figures include agents who have carried out only preparatory missions and agents who have been hired but not put into service."

Soviet espionage operatives have also been very active in other nations. The recent testimony of Aleksander Y. Kaznacheev before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee on December 14, 1959, provides extensive evidence concerning Soviet espionage activities in Asia. Similarly, the testimony of Peter S. Deryabin before the House Committee on Un-American Activities released March 17, 1959, provides evidence of Soviet espionage activities in Austria. The testimony of Yuri A. Rastvorov also before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee on February 8, 1956, April 12, 1956, October 24, 1956, and October 30, 1956, provide evidence of Soviet espionage activities in Japan. Other cases could be given; but it is abundantly clear from the instances already cited that Soviet-directed espionage activities are worldwide and extremely extensive in scope.

Question 2. How many times has it breached its commitments to other nations in the world—especially the captive nations?

With regard to the number of times the Soviet Government has breached its commitments to other countries, the Department of State is not aware of the existence of any statistical compilation. A mere count of Soviet violations, whereby, for example, a violation leading directly to the subjugation and absorption of an entire country by the U.S.S.R. would be given the same numerical weight as Soviet infringement of a trade agreement appears, in the Department's view, to lack real meaning. Of course, the Department has closely followed over the years the question of Soviet treaty violations, which has additionally been the subject of close congressional scrutiny as in the Senate Judiciary Committee's 1956 Staff Study "Soviet Political Agreements and Results" and in the 1950 report of the House Foreign Affairs Committee "Background Information on the Soviet Union in International Relations."

"Soviet Treaty Violations," No. 233 (August 10, 1959) in the series Soviet Affairs Notes, describes the principal Soviet violations. Violations occurring before and after the beginning of World War II are listed separately and appear under country-by-country breakdowns within each of these two main categories. A copy of "Soviet Treaty Violations" is enclosed.

Question 3. Is there a difference between spying by foot on land on the one hand, and by plane in the air on the other?

Considered in the light of the end purpose of espionage activities, which may be summarized as the acquisition of information which the State, against which the activities are directed, wishes to conceal from the knowledge of one or more foreign powers, there would appear to be no fundamental distinction between the various means which might be employed in securing such information.

Question 4. Is it in the interest of our country that we abandon the general and traditional methods of acquiring intelligence?

As indicated by the President in his report to the American people on May 25, 1960, the security of the United States and of the free world "demand, of course, effective systems for gathering information about the military capabilities of other powerful nations, especially those that make a fetish of secrecy. This involves many techniques and methods. In these times of vast military machines and nuclear-tipped missiles, the ferreting out of this information is indispensable to free world security. This has long been one of my most serious preoccupations. It is part of my grave responsibility, to guard ourselves and our allies against surprise attack."

In the same speech the President reiterated his "open skies" offer as a means of guarding against surprise attack. The President indicated that the United States would at an appropriate time submit a program to the United Nations with a recommendation that the United Nations itself conduct aerial reconnaissance. The program outlined by the President offers the best hope for guarding the peoples of the world against surprise attack. Unfortunately, the Soviet Government rejected the President's earlier open skies proposal. It remains to be seen whether the Soviets will reject his more recent suggestion.

Question 5. If we do so, what are the probabilities of the Soviet Union following a similar course?

In the Department's opinion, even if the United States were to abandon the general and traditional methods of acquiring intelligence, there is little likelihood that the Soviet Union would follow a similar course.

Question 6. Why did the Communists break their treaty with the Poles in World War II and stab the Poles in the back while the latter were fighting the Nazis?

The Molotov-Ribbentrop agreements of August 23, 1939, providing a 10-year nonaggression guarantee, furnished a basis for coordinated German and Soviet aggression in Eastern Europe. Poland was an early victim, falling under Nazi attack only 8 days after the agreements were signed. On September 16, 1939, the U.S.S.R. sent a note to the Polish Government stating that the Polish State was insolvent and that the Polish Government had "virtually ceased to operate." The note claimed that this situation might "create a menace to the U.S.S.R." Using this pretext, the U.S.S.R. occupied major parts of Poland on September 17, 1939. Less than 2 months later, Molotov boasted: "* * * one swift blow to Poland, first by the German and then by the Red Army, and nothing was left of this ugly offspring of the Versailles Treaty."

Question 7. What are the details concerning the brutal massacre of Polish soldiers by the Communists in the Katyn forests?

A Select Committee of the House of Representatives made an exhaustive study of the Katyn Forest massacre in 1952. The reports of this committee, the Select Committee to Conduct an Investigation and Study of the Facts, Evidence, and Circumstances of the Katyn Forest Massacre, contain more detail on this subject than is available elsewhere in the Department's files. The facts developed by the committee were brought to the attention of the United Nations by the U.S. delegation, and were given wide circulation abroad through the facilities of the U.S. Information Service.

Question 8. Why, in World War II, did the Reds, while advancing westward and nearing Poland, induce the Polish people of Warsaw to heroically rebel against the Nazi occupiers and then abandon them to slaughter by the Nazis?

In various wartime agreements, the allied nations pledged themselves to conduct the war against the enemy unrelentingly, and to cooperate after the war in plans for recovery. The U.S.S.R., however, had its own plans for postwar Communist expansion in Eastern Europe, as evidenced by subsequent developments there. This political motive was an important factor influencing Soviet military inaction during the Warsaw uprising.

Question 9. Why did the Soviet break its pledged word that the people of the satellite nations, under free and open elections, would be permitted to choose the type of government they wanted?

Soviet refusal to grant self-determination to the peoples of the satellite nations of Eastern Europe stems from the Soviet campaign during and after World War II to gain and maintain Communist control over these nations. The United States does not regard Soviet domination over the nations of Eastern Europe as an acceptable permanent condition of affairs. Regimes in these countries have been forcibly imposed and maintained, as in the case of Hungary, by repeated Soviet political and military intervention. The peoples of these countries are denied basic freedoms and real national independence.

Satisfactory solution of the Eastern European problem must be based, in keeping with the solemn pledges by the United States, Soviet, and other Allied Governments during and after World War II, upon the right of the Eastern European peoples freely (a) to choose the governments and institutions under which they will live and (b) to enjoy full national independence free from all foreign interference in their internal affairs.

Question 10. Why did the Soviet aid and induce the Red Chinese to use their military power against South Korea, resulting in death and injury to thousands of American boys?

The Soviet Union supported Communist China in the Korean war in order to secure the Soviet satellite government of North Korea for the Communist bloc and, if possible, to expand Communist power to South Korea and in Asia without instigating a world war which would have resulted from the Soviet Union's cobelligerency with North Korea.

Question 11. Why did the Soviet encourage the Red Chinese in the bombardment and killing of innocent people at the Quemoy and Matsu Islands?

The Soviet Union has consistently supported the claims of Communist China to Quemoy and Matsu. During the offshore islands crisis, in mid-1954, however, the Soviet leaders spoke of "popular" but not Soviet "government" support of the Chinese Communists, "liberation aspirations" toward the offshore islands. At that time they did not threaten to evoke the 1950 Sino-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Alliance, and Mutual Assistance. In the 1958 offshore island crisis Khrushchev did issue the warning that "an attack on the People's Republic of China, which is a great friend, ally, and neighbor of our country, is an attack on the Soviet Union," and that if Communist China fell victim to an atomic attack the aggressor would get a rebuff by the same means. The Chinese Communists, who have consistently followed aggressive policies, probably needed no encouragement to initiate the bombardment of Quemoy, but it is likely that, prior to the 1958 attack, the Red Chinese received some expression of support from the Soviet Union.

Question 12. What is the explanation for the mass and merciless murder of the freedom fighters of Hungary, Poland, and East Germany, who were fighting for liberation in those respective countries?

The Communist regime in Hungary was forcibly imposed by the Soviet Union upon the Hungarian people at the end of World War II. Since that time, the Hungarian regime has been and remains, in all essential matters, Soviet dominated. Because of its origin and nature, it is dependent in the final analysis upon Soviet power for its continued ability to exist and to rule. The Hungarian uprising was so general and sweeping that it unseated this Soviet-dominated regime, attracted large numbers of the Hungarian armed forces to either active or passive support of the revolutionary movement, and placed temporary control of the country in the hands of the freedom fighters and of a new coalition government headed by Imre Nagy, which supported the aims of the revolution. Confronted by these internal developments which clearly pointed to the realization by the Hungarian people of their aspiration to live in freedom and independence, and fearing the disintegrative effect which a successful Hungarian revolt would have on the Soviet bloc structure, the Soviet Union intervened ruthlessly with massive armed force to crush the revolt and reimpose a Soviet-dominated regime upon the Hungarian people. Following the Soviet intervention, the new Hungarian regime, supported by the continued presence of Soviet troops within Hungary, undertook a campaign of systematic and harsh reprisals against the leaders and participants in the revolt aimed at the suppression of all remaining overt dissent and opposition, the reestablishment and consolidation of its power and authority, and the discouragement of any future attempts at rebellion.

In East Germany in 1953, and in Poland in 1956, unrest occurred as a result of popular dissatisfaction with the situation in those countries. In contrast to the 1956 events in Hungary, however, these disturbances were short-lived and resulted in relatively little bloodshed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I have in my hand a newspaper which carries a report of the election mentioned by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] yesterday. The issue before the Japanese people in the province was the treaty with the United States. The results show that the person subscribing to the treaty, the person standing by Mr. Kishi, was elected by a vote of 295,000 to 186,000.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Did the Senator notice also that the majority for the Kishi party in this election was several thousand larger than it was in the last election, preceding the formulating of the Japanese-American treaty?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I did not know that.

Mr. AIKEN. That is a fact. There was a 5,000 or 6,000 larger majority in the latest election than in the previous election which was held before the treaty became effective.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise to express my gratitude to our colleague, the distinguished Senator from Ohio, for what he has said today.

I have listened to the discussions we have had on this subject. I have read the report. I think the Senator from Ohio, along with other Senators, has helped us to better understand the controversy which has been raging since the U–2 flight and since Khrushchev torpedoed the Paris conference. I thank the Senator for what he has said. I find myself in great agreement, as I usually do, with the Senator from Ohio.

It should be said on my part—although I doubt it really needs to be repeated—that I have had my grave misgivings about the conduct of our foreign policy, certainly since the death of John Foster Dulles. I think history will show that his tragic passing marked a sharp turning point in our fortunes in international affairs. When we lost his great influence and the great genius which he possessed, we lost something which I think we shall have to search far to replace.

However, the present dispute about the U–2 flight and the failure at Paris are something else and the cynical efforts of some to have it appear that this is anything else than a logical consequence of a foolish policy which they encouraged and approved is more than I can abide in silence. And the Senator from Ohio has helped greatly to unmask this cynicism. For I think it is most important that our own people should not be misled. I think our friends elsewhere in the world should not be misled by the controversy. It should not be made to appear that we are guilty of some crime, of some great wrong, of some tragic mistake which brought down a structure which had been erected for the purpose of establishing peace and preserving peace or for ending tensions. For this is not the fact.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The visitors in the galleries are reminded that they are guests of the Senate. Please be as quiet as possible in entering and departing from the Chamber. Senators will refrain from audible conversation.

The Senator from Ohio may proceed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I yield further to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. So I say I think it is tragically ironic that so many who urged the President to continue his efforts to find peace—which I know were genuine but fruitless and confused—those who encouraged him, and who said, "Yes, sir, this is right; me, too," and "more," were the first to turn on him and to condemn him and, in my judgment, to falsely charge him with responsibility for wrecking the Paris meeting. The tragedy of it all is that it should occur in the closing days, weeks, and months of his administration.

I repeat, I have had my sharp differences of opinion concerning the way our foreign affairs have been conducted. I have tried to express them as best I could. But I think it is a shame, a pity, and an injustice that the President should be charged with any responsibility at all for this failure, because it does not lie on his shoulders. It lies squarely on the shoulders of Khrushchev and his associates in the Communist bloc, not on the shoulders of President Eisenhower.

I thank the Senator from Ohio for helping us to better understand the situation. In my opinion he is one of the clear thinkers and great leaders of our time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Connecticut very much.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by other Members of the Senate this afternoon in behalf of the statement made by our colleague from Ohio. He spoke accurately of his background. I know, Mr. President, because I had the privilege of serving as the Governor of the State of Kansas while the Senator from Ohio was the Governor of Ohio. We were closely associated together for several years in that particular field. It was my privilege in 1949 to serve as chairman of the Governor's conference. When I left that fine assignment it was taken over by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who at that time was the Governor of his State.

I know of the Senator's character and ability, and his firm conviction and belief in the strength and soundness of our Government, our Nation and its economy. It is a pleasure to serve with the Senator on the Committee on Foreign Relations. He has rendered an outstanding service to the country today in laying before us this splendid statement on our country, its background and the need for intelligence.

This has been the issue. It was my privilege to go through the hearings. I saw the pictures. I heard the testimony of the witnesses. The question is a question of the necessity of intelligence. Mr. President, had we not had the U–2 flights—despite some criticism, perhaps, in regard to the timing of them—we would have been negligent by not trying to secure any information we could for the security and the defense of this Nation.

I thank the Senator from Ohio for his statement.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, mention has been made of the years 1949 and 1950. When Mr. Acheson, who was Secretary of State at the time, was being attacked in those years, I thought there was, frequently, political motivation behind the attacks, and as a citizen of the country I did not like them.

What I have said about the U–2 incident I will say about a successor, whoever it may be, based upon my purpose of serving the Nation. The position of Secretary of State is much like the position of a safety director in a metropolitan city. The task is practically insoluble. Sufficient grounds can be found for legitimate criticism, but when there is added to the legitimate criticism the criticism based upon political motivations, the critic is not serving his country.

I think all of us should give heed to the admonition, "Strive with all your might to keep political motivations out of judgments which you form, especially if they are likely to have, when expressed, a prejudicial effect upon the character and the reputation of your country in the minds of the citizens of the world."

POSTHUMOUS AWARD OF MEDALS TO CERTAIN CHAPLAINS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the award posthumously of appropriate medals to Chaplain George L. Fox, Chaplain Alexander D. Goode, Chaplain Clark V. Poling, and Chaplain John P. Washington, which was, on page 1, line 5, strike out "Cambridge" and insert "Gilman,".

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, this bill relates to the posthumous award of appropriate medals to the celebrated four chaplains of World War II. The House amendment corrects the address of Chaplain George L. Fox to show it as "Gilman," Vt., instead of "Cambridge," Vt. The Committee on Armed Services has recommended concurrence in the House amendment.

I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to S. 2969.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJUSTMENT IN SUGAR QUOTAS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 217) to authorize the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quotas for foreign countries.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BENNETT. Have we now come to the point at which time will be under control?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] having concluded his address, the unanimous-consent agreement now becomes effective.

Mr. BENNETT. When the majority leader obtained the unanimous-consent agreement, he announced that before time control went into effect there would be a quorum call. So I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time not come from either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as I understand, under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 217, the sugar joint resolution, and there will be an hour of debate—30 minutes to each side on the joint resolution and 15 minutes to each side on any amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that prior to the inauguration of that unanimous-consent agreement, there be not to exceed 30 minutes for the consideration of the conference report on the Federal Highway Act of 1960.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY ACT OF 1960—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 10495) to authorize appropriations for the fiscal years 1962 and 1963 for the construction of certain highways in accordance with title 23 of the United States Code, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of today, p. 15759, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. McNAMARA obtained the floor.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I wish to thank the very able Senator from Michigan, for the work he has done on the Federal Highway Act of 1960. But especially, I wish to extend my appreciation to him for his efforts in behalf of the so-called "thousand-mile amendment."

This amendment struck from the 1956 highway act a proviso which excluded from interstate estimates and apportionments certain mileage in Colorado, South Dakota, and other States.

I wish through him to thank all the members of the committee, and through them I wish to express to the Members of the House our gratitude for this action. We were certain that eventually Colorado would be permitted to include its Denver to Utah road in the financing phase of the program. That was the reason I submitted the original "1,000 mile amendment" to the Public Roads Subcommittee.

Mr. McNAMARA. We received the request of the junior Senator from Colorado in committee, and we made it a part of the program. When the bill originated, the thinking was that obviously it would have to be done in the future, but it was finally agreed that it would be just as well to do it now. The Senator's calling it to our attention was very timely.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator from Michigan. I also thank the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], whose alert, able, and diligent work on the floor of the Senate made possible the acceptance of the concept I proposed in committee. And I extend my appreciation to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], and the other Senators who worked on the matter, especially the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]. This amendment is of particular importance to my State, because if we had not been included in the program it would have delayed estimates and apportionments for 260 miles of the Colorado Interstate Highway through the mountains for perhaps 3 or 4 years.

It is my understanding that our mileage can now be included in the January estimate of the Bureau of Public Roads.

Mr. McNAMARA. That is right.

Mr. CARROLL. And that perhaps there will be some apportionment for the 260 miles for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1963.

Mr. McNAMARA. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. I could not let this opportunity to express my gratitude pass because this has been worked on for years by many men. It first originated with former Senator Ed Johnson. I accompanied him here to Washington early in 1956 to work on including mountain mileage for Colorado. The Congress that year put in the 1,000 miles, with the proviso that it would not be financed. Credit is also due the Governor of Colorado, Steve McNichols, for his untiring work on this issue for the past 4 years.

Senators KERR and CHAVEZ were most helpful on this matter when we desperately needed allies for the Colorado mileage in 1956, and in that respect I am confident that we could not have gotten the mileage at all without the guidance and support of Congressman JOHN BLATNIK of Minnesota, who is a great friend of Colorado. I thank you and them, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McNAMARA. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand that there are other Senators who desire to speak on this subject. We should have a vote on it, but as a courtesy to other Senators I would suggest that the attachés inform all Senators who wish to speak on any subject. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I wish highly to commend the Subcommittee on Roads of the Committee on Public Works, and the Public Works Committee itself, for its excellent work in the preparation of the omnibus highway bill. It is a matter of great interest to the people of Alaska, because until 1956 Alaska was wholly excluded from Federal highway aid legislation.

When the original act was passed in 1916, Congress passed one of the most important bills that it had ever passed in its history. As we know, it was passed because at that time the automobile, which only a few years ago was called the horseless carriage, had acquired such perfection that it became the ambition of every American family to own a car. Furthermore, businesses were beginning to use the trucks. Congress very correctly realized that if this new instrument of locomotion were to become universally available, the United States would have to have a universal system of highways with a fairly high standard. If we were to do the job properly, it would have to be done by joint Federal-State cooperation. If it were left wholly to the States, one State, which was roadminded and progressive, and perhaps also well to do, would have fine highways, but when one crossed the border of that State into another State, which was less highway minded, or not as well off, the highway would deteriorate into a mud puddle in wet weather, or into a streak of dust when dry.

In the Highway Act of 1916 the Federal Government agreed to match dollar for dollar Federal funds with State funds, with the understanding that in return for this Federal matching a certain high standard jointly arrived at by the State and the Federal Government would be used.

However, the Western States, the so-called public land States, which contain large areas of land in public domain, lands that are not subject to taxation, and therefore produce no revenue, would receive a larger share than a 50–50 matching. Therefore, their share was calculated on a complex formula which was based on the total area of the State and the proportion of the public domain in the State, the population and the existing post-road mileage.

Alaska was not included in the Federal aid legislation because while under the population part of the act the formula would have produced a very small amount, under the area part, and the public domain part it would be very large. So Congress passed up Alaska, not appreciating that our needs were just as great as our area.

For 40 years our voteless delegates in the House of Representatives year after year would introduce bills to include Alaska in this beneficial legislation. In the meantime, Hawaii was included. Puerto Rico was also included, which pays no Federal taxes. Alaska was not included, even though Alaska was paying all the Federal taxes. That was another example of taxation without representation.

In 1956, a further discrimination loomed up against Alaska. That was when President Eisenhower introduced his proposal for a superhighway system, a throughway system, which had two objectives. One was to improve our arteries of transportation in the country, to take care of the greatly increased traffic and the great increase in the number of automobiles. The other was as a defense measure, to facilitate the evacuation of urban areas in the event of an atomic attack. The President proposed that this new program be financed on a long-range basis, with bonding and no immediate appropriation of funds. The House and Senate, however, disagreed. They agreed on the desirability of the program, but disagreed on the method of financing. The Congress felt that we should not burden posterity with paying for the benefits which this generation would receive, and proposed, instead of long-term bonding, a pay-as-you-go basis. It therefore provided for additional taxes on trucks, trailers, tires, and gasoline, the revenues from which would pay for the program.

In one respect, however, the President and Congress agreed, and that was that Alaska should be excluded from the benefits, although included in the taxation. In that form the bill was passed. At that time again the Senate took pity on Alaska and tried for the first time to include us in the old highway program, from which Alaska had been excluded for 40 years. The late Senator Neuberger, of Oregon, who was a great friend of Alaska—he had been there and knew our problems—introduced that measure. However, knowing that we could not get in under the full formula, he suggested that half our area be included in calculating Alaska's share. Even that was deemed too generous, and Alaska finally got in on a reduced formula in which only one-third of Alaska's area was used as a base for calculation. For that reason, Alaska has little highway mileage. Today, Alaska is faced with the unique situation that not merely a few but a majority of its communities are unconnected by either highway or railway. Such a situation would be unthinkable in the 48 older States.

This is the problem which confronts Alaska. The Senate committee was generous with respect to three amendments of benefit to Alaska. I regret that in conference one of these, giving Alaska 250 miles of Interstate Highway, was taken out, I think in response to administration pressure and the threat of veto, but we are grateful to the committee for including the proposals it did. Two of them survive. We know of the committee's interest and we hope that in the future it will go further to help us solve the problem—the problem of roadlessness which must be resolved if Alaska is to develop. I am grateful to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Roads, my good friend the Senator from Michigan, and to the chairman of the Public Works Committee, the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico and to the other committee members for their sympathy and understanding, and hope it will continue to exist.

Mr. McNAMARA. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 15 minutes are available on each side.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I thought 30 minutes had been allotted to discuss the report. If the arrangement is different from that, I have not been informed.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Department of Commerce is maintaining its lead in the race between departments and agencies of the administration to determine which can release the most press announcements as substitutes for acts of public responsibility. If it is a question of which department can compound the most confusion, perhaps the award for this doubtful distinction might best, for the moment, be awarded to the Department of Commerce.

Twice during the past month the Secretary of Commerce has caused press releases to be issued with respect to the Federal aid highway program. One was issued on June 10; the other, on June 27. Both are replete with verbal manifestations of dollar juggling and fiscal finagling, which seems to be the accepted practice of the administration concerning highway programs.

When the June 10 announcement of obligation limitations was made, it referred to quarterly contract controls and a different schedule for 1962 than obtains in the new, June 27 release, which holds out the promise of semi-annual contract controls. The inference, erroneously drawn in many quarters, was that the administration, by some stroke of magic, was doubling the outlay of contract-controlled money to be made available to the States for the national system of interstate and defense highways.

Mr. President, I have before me an article published in the Wall Street Journal, the headline of which indicates that what I have said is true from the standpoint of the construction placed upon the stories which are built from the release which I have mentioned.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was not aware that the Senator from West Virginia felt as he did about the press releases issued by the Department of Commerce in relation to the highway fund. If he had strong feelings on this matter, I simply regret that they were not called to the attention of the committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I brought the release to the attention of the conference committee yesterday.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator did not bring his views to the attention of the committee during the time we had the bill under consideration. However the Senator may have felt about the matter, it seems to me that the charge of juggling and finagling is a pretty strong charge. To bring it up when the conference report is being considered under a limitation of time, when it is hoped it will be adopted, and when a recess resolution is pending in both bodies, is perhaps bringing it up when there is not adequate time to examine the source of the Senator's discomfiture.

I regret that the Senator's views were not made available to the Senator from South Dakota, so that the committee might have examined into them. If the Senator mentioned them in the proceedings of the conference yesterday, I was not aware of it. We were working on an amendment in which the Senator from West Virginia was very much interested. I thought most of the time of the conference consisted of a discussion of that amendment.

What the Senator is now saying did not appear to enter into anything which was before the conferees. I did not know that there was any power in the conferees to take up the matter of press releases.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, there is no Member of the Senate, on either side of the aisle, for whom I have more esteem than for the Senator from South Dakota. However, I remind him that in the conference yesterday I used the very words I have used here today. I said there was dollar juggling and fiscal finagling. I hope the Senator recalls that statement.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No. The Senator from South Dakota does not have a perfect memory. I should say that, probably, I was inattentive if the Senator used those words yesterday. The conference was busy on other matters; and if the Senator from West Virginia used that phrase, I must have been occupied with some other item. The Senator from West Virginia knows that we had other matters under investigation, and he must have spoken when I was consulting with other conferees.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am grateful for the statement of the Senator from South Dakota. He probably was busy consulting with other conferees. I know he was conferring with members of the staff of the Bureau of Public Roads who were present. I simply say that the record will show, from the statements of the many conferees who were present, that I used those words.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Was there anything before the conferees, in the form of a disagreement among them, concerning the taking of action on the matter about which the Senator from West Virginia is complaining?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I complained then and I complain now, as one of the Senators from West Virginia, about what I believe to be false hopes which are held out, as to what will happen in the next 3 months, by reason of the figures issued in the release of June 10, and those set forth in the release of June 27, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I shall not take any more time to discuss this question, because I understand that the time limitation on the conference report will make it impossible. It is important that the report be agreed to, if possible, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the sugar bill.

In view of the fact that I was unaware that the Senator from West Virginia was disturbed about this matter, I shall let him proceed to say what he wishes to say.

I hope he will reserve enough time for the chairman of the conferees to yield a minute or two to the Senator from Colorado to discuss the conference report.

Mr. MCNAMARA. I have the assurance of the Senator from West Virginia that he will allow for such time.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I most assuredly wish to cooperate with the Senator from South Dakota, as I wish to cooperate with all Senators.

The amendment to which I shall speak was offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], and myself. As the Senator from South Dakota knows, it was the major difference between the House and the Senate conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise Senators that all time under the unanimous-consent agreement will expire at 8 minutes past 4.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not correct to say that the conferees cut out of the bill the amendment which would have been very helpful to depressed areas in the State of the Senator from West Virginia, in my State, and in the State of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], where unemployment is chronic and persistent?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. The labor surplus areas, not only in these 3 or 4 States, but in 34 States, were adversely affected by the deletion of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I must admit that I cannot understand why this action was taken, in the light of the deplorable conditions which all of us from those areas have called to the attention of the Senate time after time for the past 3 or 4 years. I commend the Senator from West Virginia for the protest he is making, and I associate myself with him.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am grateful to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I must move ahead, to accommodate the time situation.

Mr. President, it seems to me there is too much emphasis in too many States, in Congress, and in this administration's management of the total Federal-aid highway program on the Interstate System. Accordingly there is little wonder the primary and secondary roads in States with depressed areas are—like the labor surplus sections as a whole—the symbols of this administration's apparent disregard for worthy citizens and important regions of our country.

To aid these troubled areas, we must take those actions necessary to overcome conditions of chronic unemployment and underemployment; we must improve their physical aspects. Nothing is more important to the accomplishment of this rehabilitation of blighted regions than the building and maintaining of primary and secondary roads adequate for this era.

I am unwilling to stand inactive on this issue.

In our zeal to connect the larger cities of the Nation with magnificent highways we must not neglect to take the steps so necessary to make our primary and secondary road systems adequate to the needs of communities which are a vital part of these United States and the great urbanized centers.

Mr. President, in the Senate-House conference which brought forth this report now before us, I was dismayed to note the overwhelming degree of emphasis our conferring colleagues from the other body placed on the inviolability of the Interstate System and the sanctity with which they surround the contract control dollar juggling—and, I reiterate, the fiscal finagling—of the Bureau of the Budget and the Department of Commerce in their management of the Highway Trust Fund and the Federal-Aid Highway Act.

The degree to which the Secretary of Commerce sought to influence—and seems to have been successful in influencing—defeat of the amendment the Senate approved without a dissenting voice or vote to place more emphasis on Federal-aid primary and secondary highway systems in chronic labor surplus areas is apparent.

In this connection, I quote from the first two paragraphs of a June 27, 1960, press release from the Office of the Secretary, Department of Commerce:

> Secretary of Commerce Frederick H. Mueller announced today his intention to apportion $2.2 billion of Federal aid to the States for the fiscal year 1962 (which begins July 1, 1961) to continue the program for construction of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways.
> Apportionment of the full $2.2 billion might be blocked by action in the Congress on the amendments proposed to the Federal-aid bill now under consideration. Among the amendments is one which would provide an additional $100 million for fiscal year 1963 for special work on the Federal-aid primary and secondary highway systems and their urban extensions (the so-called ABC program), to be financed from the Highway Trust Fund. The effect of such an amendment would be to reduce the amount of money available for the Interstate System apportionment for fiscal year 1962.

There is the crux of the administration's position—don't change any emphasis from the Interstate system to the "backbone" system; don't give an extra mile of road or a dollar of special authorizations for helping to improve the roads into or through economically depressed areas; don't place increased emphasis on farm-to-market roads.

I regret that the representatives of the other body in the conference seem to have adopted the same general position. My colleagues of this body in the conference were generous in supporting a position more favorable to the proposed Senate emphasis on highway aid for chronic labor surplus areas and the so-called backbone system in general. But the stand taken by the House conferees was extremely adamant and unyielding and, as a consequence, the Senate position was impossible to maintain and still bring forth a report and a compromise Federal-aid highway construction bill.

Insofar as relates to the conference deletion of the $100 million annual so-called D-fund addition from the bill as passed by the Senate, I officially noted in writing my exception when this report was signed. In this action, I was joined by the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. President, I am deeply disappointed that the legislation as reported by the conference provides no incentive to the States and no new financial help from the Federal Government for highway improvement in chronic labor surplus areas. Otherwise, it is a better bill than the administration recommended. Although I do not consider it an adequate measure, I will support its passage as the best legislation obtainable under existing circumstances.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I rise primarily to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] for his work on the Committee on Public Works and also on the conference committee.

I also wish to pay my tribute and my thanks to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], whose amendment, the other evening, cured one of the great defects of the bill and one of the inequities of our Federal system. Without his amendment, we would not have been able to obtain this measure; and I am fully cognizant of that fact. All of us who are involved are very appreciative.

Mr. President, I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia. I know how hard it often is, in a conference committee, to decide on the best course to follow. Sometimes we have to take positions we do not wish to take. Yesterday afternoon, some of us had to do that in connection with another conference report. But if the right does not prevail at this time, I am sure it will prevail on another occasion; and we shall have other opportunities to proceed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, as one of the conferees, I urge approval of the conference report. While we were not able to obtain concurrence of the House conferees on all of the Senate amendments, they did concur in four important ones.

Two amendments agreed to were of special interest to Alaska. One increases the classes of public lands that can be counted in determining the ratio of Federal lands for matching Federal-aid funds. Its effect is to reduce the matching requirements for the so-called public lands States from which Alaska is the largest beneficiary. The other one makes ferry approaches eligible for the Federal-aid systems.

Two other amendments of substance were agreed to in the conference. One increases the authorization for the public lands by $500,000 for 1 year. It is the amendment in which the Senator from Georgia was interested.

The other amendment was the one offered by me, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LUSK], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], when the bill was before the Senate. That amendment was for the purpose of removing the limitation which had existed with respect to including the costs of a portion of the Interstate Highway System in the formula for apportionment of funds among the States.

The Senator from South Dakota is glad to report that the House conferees concurred in the amendment. It is a logical action at this time, because new cost estimates are due from all the States in January. The adoption of this amendment means that next year the apportionments can be made on the basis of completing the Interstate System uniformly throughout the several States by the target date finally agreed upon.

I appreciate the excellent cooperation on the part of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA]. He has been an ideal chairman, both in the Public Works Subcommittee on Roads and in the conference. It has been a pleasure to work with him and the other members of the conference.

Mr. MCNAMARA. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. President, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the report was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ADJUSTMENT IN SUGAR QUOTAS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 217) to authorize the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quotas for foreign countries.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may suggest the absence of a quorum, without having the time required for it charged to the time available to either side under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the time limitation is in effect.

Will the Chair lay before the Senate the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate, Senate Joint Resolution 217, which will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 217), to authorize the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quotas for foreign countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] have an agreement to modify the joint resolution, and I should like to have the Senator from Florida briefly state what that agreement is.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, very briefly, the Senate did not get a bill with reference to changing the sugar quota until yesterday, so the Finance Committee has had very little opportunity to consider going into the merits or demerits of the House bill. However, it was agreed by all that the President should have the authority to deal with Cuba. If the President, in his wisdom, as the leader of our foreign policy, decides he wants to cut the sugar quota for Cuba, he should be able to do it. Nobody is in disagreement about that. So the Finance Committee came out with the joint resolution, with the names of the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER and Mr. LONG], and almost everybody who is now present, in the group supporting it.

However, the Senator from New Mexico found certain objections in the resolution. We have been discussing them. It now appears that the most expeditious thing we can do is merely to give the President authority to cut the quota for Cuba if he decides to. Under the joint resolution, "the President shall determine the quota for Cuba under such act for the balance of the calendar year 1960 in such amount or amounts as he shall find from time to time to be in the national interests"—period—with nothing after that. We had provided in the resolution that he could make up the quotas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, is that change agreeable to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I would like to add a word of explanation. We shall be back in session in August. I hope when we are we will have an opportunity to pass permanent sugar legislation. In the meantime, I think the President is given ample authority to deal with Cuba. Somebody has raised the point that we are not going to be able to get sugar. The answer to that is that we are to be gone only a month, and we can find it in the meantime.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I had hoped we could pass the complete resolution. However, I agree with the Senator from New Mexico that if we give the President power to determine the sugar quota for Cuba, we will not run into difficulty, and we can deal with the President's authority to acquire sugar when we return. I am happy to agree to the proposal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT].

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I think this is a very satisfactory solution of the problem. I am very glad the Senator from New Mexico, the Senator from Florida, and the Senator from Utah have been able to get together on it. When we get back in August, we can resolve the problem and pass sugar legislation; but this authority is necessary at this time for the international welfare of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I support the resolution as modified. I believe it is the best procedure to take. I revere the traditions and practices of this body, but also those of the House of Representatives. I think all should bear in mind that the sugar bill was messaged over to the Senate on July 1. The passage of this joint resolution will meet the requirements of everyone. When we reconvene we shall have an opportunity to go into this matter and pass a sugar bill which will be in the national interest.

I urge the passage of the joint resolution as it was suggested it be amended, and I hope the House of Representatives will accept it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BUTLER. I have prepared a statement in connection with this matter, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUTLER

REDUCING CUBAN SUGAR QUOTA IN FAVOR OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

It is interesting to note the contrast in policy of two former territories of the United States—the Philippine Islands and Cuba.

Assurances of continued loyalty and friendship to the United States on the one hand; angry, almost fanatic, castigation of the United States and its officials and a continuing policy of uncompensated confiscation of property and business on the other. Such is the difference in attitude and policy of the Philippines and Cuba toward us. One, obviously a true friend; the other an apparent enemy.

Yet, our sugar policy toward both of these underprivileged countries is one that belies the imagination.

Cuba for some reason continues to maintain a preferred position with regard to its sugar export to the United States. Not only does it supply approximately one-third of our domestic consumption—domestic producers supply about 53 percent—but it is also paid a premium price for it of approximately 2 cents per pound over the world market. It also receives preferential sugar treatment in other ways that I shall point out later.

The Philippine Islands on the other hand, with many more people than Cuba dependent upon its chief industry—sugar, and with a tremendous sugar-producing potential, made possible by postwar rehabilitation of its war-devastated sugar industry, is currently in the process of begging the United States for an increase in its effective quota of only about 10.43 percent, notwithstanding that its economy is extremely shaky and the threat of communism is ever present.

In tons, the comparative figures are about 3.06 million short tons in 1959 for Cuba, to about 980,000 short tons for the Philippines. In 1934, it was 1,866,482 short tons for Cuba and 1,005,602 short tons for the Philippines. A disproportionate change if there ever was one. It doesn't stop there, however. That's only the basic quota.

Existing law provides for an overall basic consumption quota in the United States of 8,350,000 short tons. Of that amount, the domestic areas, in total, have been accorded the right to supply approximately 53 percent, Cuba about one-third, and the Philippines about 11.1 percent. The remaining 3 percent is imported from other foreign countries. It is this quota upon which the aforementioned figures are based.

In 1956 an amendment to the Sugar Act made provision for proportional allotment to various countries of domestic consumption in excess of the basic amount of 8,350,000 short tons. Of that excess, domestic suppliers are allotted 55 percent and Cuba 29.59 percent with the balance to other foreign countries except the Philippines which does not share at all. This lowers the Philippine quota from a stated 11.1 percent to an actual 10.43 percent on a total estimated consumption in 1960 of 9,200,000 short tons. Preferential sugar treatment for Cuba does not even stop here, however.

In some years, certain countries are unable to meet their quota and deficits result. When such deficits are incurred, present law provides that Cuba shall be entitled to supply a large percentage of it. This year alone, Puerto Rican deficits will benefit Cuba to the extent of enabling it to supply us with 165,000 tons of sugar over its quota. Deficits in other countries could possibly increase this even more. The Philippines do not share in these deficits in any way. It can, therefore, easily be seen that Cuba receives preferential treatment in many ways with respect to sugar. It isn't only limited to a premium price.

Haiti, another friend of ours, also wishes to have its small quota of about 8,000 tons doubled or even tripled. That amount would be a mere drop in the domestic sugar bucket. That country is ready at a moment's notice to put another mill, now standing idle, into operation to meet this quota.

Yet it seems the friends have to go begging while Cuba continues to get what it wants—both from the standpoint of confiscated U.S. business properties and retention of the sugar quota.

Some adjustment should and must be made as between Cuba and our avowed friends. The Cuban Government recently committed itself to export one million tons of sugar annually to the Soviet Union for the next five years. It has also agreed to send 60,000 tons to East Germany and 50,000 tons to Poland and Communist China. On the whole, Cuba seems to be doing a pretty good business. It has expanded its market over what it has been in past years by trading with the Iron Curtain bloc. It necessarily follows, therefore, that it is not dependent upon U.S. trade to the same degree that it was heretofore.

I do not for a minute advocate complete elimination of the Cuban sugar quota. To do so would surely, as some contend, elevate Castro to the rank of martyr—an honor to which that bearded, tieless television orator is not entitled. More important, it would seriously impair the Cuban economy and be injurious to the people—many of whom, in spite of everything, are still our friends.

I do, however, advocate reducing the quota to a more reasonable level and suggest that the criterion to be used in determining the degree of reduction be the amount of trade that Cuba does with Iron Curtain countries, or a percentage thereof.

This year, since Cuba is committed to ship 1,110,000 tons of sugar to Iron Curtain bloc countries, my plan would call for a reduction in its quota of 1,110,000 tons, or a substantial percentage thereof. The quota would thereafter slide upward or downward depending upon Cuban trade behind the Iron Curtain. This reduction in the Cuban quota could then be allocated among other more friendly sugar quota countries, principally the Philippines.

No one can argue that in so doing we are out to get Cuba or Castro or that we are attempting to paralyze its economy. We would merely be adjusting its quota, to the benefit of our friends, to reflect new business by Cuba and its lessened dependence on us—something Castro apparently desires.

Frankly, I think it is shocking when our great friend in the Far East has to come practically begging on its knees to get an increase in quota—especially when it has the facilities to supply us with substantially more tonnage. On President Eisenhower's recent trip to the Philippines, he and President Garcia reemphasized the need for a strong stable economy in that country and recognized the desirability of increased trade between the two countries, as a means of stabilizing that economy. Mere extension of the Sugar Act would in no way assist in achieving this objective. It would merely maintain the status quo. The Philippines have in the past supplied us with 15.41 percent of our sugar consumption. At the very minimum it should be returned to that level. I think if we provide the means by which the quota can be increased, we would by immediate overt action carry out at least in part the President's promise to that country and assist in repelling the spread of communism.

We have to reassure our Philippine friends by affirmative action—not words. Communism is a festering sore in every society where the people by and large are underprivileged. The remedy is wider employment and a better standard of living. We will substantially assist in meeting both of these desirable objectives if we enable that country to materially increase its sugar export to us.

The problem of spreading communism also exists in many Latin American countries, perhaps to an even greater degree. We must do something to stop it and we must do it promptly. Both areas can be materially helped by intelligent adjustment of our sugar program.

In order to best administer the principle of changing quotas which I advocate, the President should be given outright authority, which he does not now have, to change quotas; or, at least, authority guided by some standard such as that which I have previously outlined. There should also be authority in the President to immediately change a quota when a country is faced with a deficit.

To show how the present inflexible system can work to our detriment and to the decided benefit of a supplier country, such as Cuba, under present law, if a country finds a more favorable market during the big sugar consumption months and ships sugar elsewhere, it does not lose its quota; rather, it is entitled to make up that quota at any time during the year. This can cause a flood of sugar at the year's end when it is not needed. If the President had the authority to immediately reallocate a deficit, the danger of shortage during peak months and overabundance during short demand months would be eliminated.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I regret that the Senate has not had a sugar bill in time to act on it before we recess. Under the circumstances, however, this resolution is about all we will be able to pass before we come back in August. Therefore, I favor it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was very hopeful that some time this year we would be able to pass a realistic sugar bill. Yesterday the resolution now pending was discussed with several Members of the House. There was disagreement on their part in respect to giving the President the right to purchase sugar on the domestic and foreign market. As I understand, it has been agreed to so amend the resolution as to merely give the President the right to deal with the sugar quota insofar as Cuba is concerned, without in any manner distributing or replacing any cuts in the quota the President may make.

I am very hopeful, in light of the amendment to the resolution, the House will agree to it as passed by the Senate, and as it was concurred in by Members of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, with respect to Senate Joint Resolution 217, I move to amend it by striking out everything after the word "interest" on line 8, page 1, and adding a period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, there has been urgent need for action on the sugar problem for many months. It is regrettable that we have not had an opportunity to act on such legislation before now. If Congress failed to do anything about the Cuba Sugar Act before the recess, with all the insults we have received from Cuba and confiscation of property, and so forth, she would have received a bigger sugar quota than before. Under the circumstances, I agree with the leaders that nothing else could be done but amend the resolution and send it to the House.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, Castro's stepped-up campaign of hatred for the United States is represented both by the increasing venom in his harangues and by his widening program of expropriation. This, I am sure, has made all of us realize that we must not leave here tonight without giving the President the power to readjust the Cuban sugar quota, if necessary to preserve and protect our country's security.

Day before yesterday the House passed a bill which would give the President this power but would also extend the present Sugar Act for 1 year. It would also put rigid limitations on his power to acquire replacement sugar. Now that it has come over to us, the Finance Committee has had no chance to study it, or to consider the many bills which have been introduced by our own Members suggesting a wide variety of approaches to the problem of sugar quotas. To adopt the House bill would be to abandon these and postpone until January 1, 1962, any opportunity to make any substantive changes in the present quota pattern.

Since we are to come back on the 8th of August, we shall have an opportunity to hold hearings and to give complete consideration not only to the 1-year extension proposed by the House but also to the various ideas contained in the Senate bills. In the meantime, it could be tragic if between now and August 8 the President did not have the power which the House bill would grant to him.

This resolution would give the President authority to adjust the Cuban quota for 1960. Presumably this power would continue during the rest of this year. Actually, the practical effect of the resolution is to make sure that the President will have this power between now and the time we complete our work on the sugar bill during the August session. Obviously if we can have the opportunity to study the bill in August, we can also reconsider the authority this resolution gives to the President and may either confirm or change it.

I am sure that the leadership of both Houses is aware of the seriousness of the situation in Cuba.

I hope that we will adopt the resolution and give the House a chance to act on it.

Mr. HRUSKA subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at a point immediately prior to the vote on the sugar resolution, a brief statement which I have prepared on the subject.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HRUSKA

Particularly in view of the recent, disheartening turn of events in Cuba now is the time to think clearly, speak plainly, and act decisively. No other single piece of legislation will permit us at this time to express our concern over the course of our relations with that once friendly nation lying off the shores of Florida.

The incredible character of the acts of Premier Castro removes the issue of what to do with the Sugar Act from the level of vindictiveness or retaliation, although the provocation would be ample if we were looking for excuses. This is no longer merely a question of acting hastily and rashly in the face of a sudden turnabout of events and relations. Things have proceeded much too far for that charge.

Indeed, it is fair to say that our forbearance in the face of unjustified and unprecedented barrage of charges and acts by one country to another has been exemplary. We forbear, not from indifference or indecision, but by a willingness to be patient as a new government struggled to gain its balance and recover such ground as was lost under the Batista regime. But the reckless and outright aggressive practices in which Cuba has indulged itself these past several months no longer can be borne with patience and in silence.

By her own actions Cuba forced the issue we are now debating. She has ruptured the friendly relations and violated accepted principles of international law that exist between our two countries. On our part, the time is past when we can say Cuba is merely riding out the revolutionary storm. Her every act demonstrates that she is perpetuating these difficulties for her own reasons, difficult as they are to perceive.

At this time our own national interests dictates a new course of action by the Congress. Events of the recent past manifest that we cannot sit idly by, committing ourselves with regard to our sugar requirements to a producer nation whose ability to perform its obligation appear to be governed by whim or fancy—or the desires of other unfriendly nations. The American consumer must not be caught short and be put through the wringer by the momentary disposition of Premier Castro.

His abusive language we can—to a degree—discount and ignore. But we are not powerless to defend our vital interests and to deal with whatever hostile and ruthless attacks he is disposed to make.

Due to such events, the basis of our relations shifts, so to speak, and the risks we were once willing to take in a generous and forgiving spirit now reach out and involve our national security. At this point, the question is thrown into a larger frame of reference. We sense the insidious and diabolical influences of Communist Russia at work. We rightly take firm steps to thwart their further development. In this context the action which we are contemplating is thoroughly justified and will be completely understood and supported by all our allies in this hemisphere and across the seas. This should extend to an unmistakable statement of U.S. policy that we will not tolerate formation of a mutual defense pact between Cuba and Russia which will preclude any country in the Western Hemisphere the exercising of its right to determine the kind of government it desires for itself or which will threaten the peace and security of the world.

The senior Senator from Nebraska is gratified, Mr. President, that the resolution at hand accords the President the discretion and power to cut the Cuba sugar quota whenever the national interests dictate.

By vesting this discretionary power in the President, we permit a rapid adjustment to any situation that unfortunately might develop between the two countries. President Eisenhower is uniquely equipped to sense and respond to such situations, having immediate and comprehensive reports flowing into him round the clock, whether it be a workday or holiday, and whether Congress is in session or not. Only the President is therefore able to act before, rather than after, the fact. It is sound legislative judgment to authorize him to cut quotas immediately if the circumstances warrant that action. We should not freeze our trade position by law at a time when all considerations demand the most fluid or flexible actions.

As I have said, the necessary precautions regarding the precarious situation in Cuba are amply taken by vesting the President with discretionary authority to cut quotas. For that reason, there is no necessity to scuttle the proposal to extend the act for 4 years and deny our producers the proper opportunity to plan their programs with what assurances this law provides.

I support wholeheartedly the act of vesting the President with the power to cut Cuba's sugar quota whenever the national interests require that to be done. I urge this body to consider that, when that provision is adopted, enough safeguards will be taken to permit a 4-year extension to the act, in the interest of promoting an orderly development and reasonable stabilization of our domestic sugar industry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if it is agreeable to the minority leader, I am willing to yield back my remaining time. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has been yielded back. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 217) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

So the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 217), as amended, was passed, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1948, as amended:

(1) The President shall determine the quota for Cuba under such Act for the balance of the calendar year 1960 in such amount or amounts as he shall find from time to time to be in the national interest.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the title which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to authorize the President to make certain adjustments in the sugar quota for Cuba."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD a statement which I have prepared on the sugar resolution.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MOSS

I support the resolution. In view of the steadily worsening situation in Cuba, Congress should not recess, to be gone for several weeks, without giving the President the authority to adjust the Cuban sugar quota.

I am confident that most Americans have deep sympathy for the Cuban people in their time of great trial. We all dislike the idea of penalizing them by taking away the sugar quotas upon which much of the economy of the island and the well-being of the people are based.

But we must be realistic. We must deal with Castro, and his Communist-studded government, in language which will be understood. We cannot submit to further blackmail. We cannot allow a strutting and irresponsible leader of a foreign country to dictate our internal policy and challenge our national integrity. We have lost enough prestige around the world already.

Castro has warned that any cut in the Cuban sugar quota will result in wholesale confiscation of property there which is owned or managed by Americans. Already more than $500 million in American investments has been confiscated, and there is no hint of repayment. What have we got to lose?

America can well use the Cuban sugar quota to expand its own domestic production and to improve relations with some of our friends in Latin America who do not now have a sugar quota. My own State of Utah would welcome the opportunity to expand sugar production to meet domestic consumption levels, and I know many other western and southern sugar-producing States would feel the same.

POLITICAL STABILITY AND ECONOMIC WELFARE OF LATIN-AMERICAN NATIONS

Mr. KEFAUVER. The political stability and economic welfare of all Latin American nations have always been regarded as being of vital interest to the people of the United States. Over the years we have come to regard our sister American republics as our full partners in the American community. We have not only accepted but we have encouraged others to accept the concept of collective responsibility for the solutions of inter-American problems, whether economic or military.

It is a matter of deep concern to all Americans that on the island of Cuba—at our very doorstep—the Castro regime has taken advantage of the legitimate hopes and aspirations of the Cuban people only to victimize them and to create a threat to peace in the Western Hemisphere. It is now obvious that Fidel Castro has brought about conditions leading to the complete economic and political slavery of the Cuban people and which, if unchecked, may spread to other nations in the Western Hemisphere.

The Cuban people suffered long and deeply under the cruel excesses of Dictator Batista. They had every right to hope—as did freedom-loving people everywhere—that better things were in store for them when Castro, loudly proclaiming his belief in democracy, captured the imagination of the Latin American people in his successful campaign to overthrow the oppressive Batista regime.

These hopes have been dashed upon the rocks. Castro has unmasked himself before the world as the willing tool, if not an active advocate, of international communism. The right of free speech, the right to own property, and other freedoms which we all too often take for granted are rapidly vanishing from the scene on the island of Cuba.

It is time that the U.S. Government and the American people looked realistically at the infiltration of communism in Cuba, and it is time we took positive action to combat it.

The policy of patience and forbearance which was followed by the Eisenhower administration in the face of the early anti-United States tirades by Castro and his henchmen was commendable. Precipitant action taken unilaterally by the United States would undoubtedly have caused resentment and suspicion not only on the part of the Cuban people but on the part of others throughout the Western Hemisphere.

Tennessee's own great Cordell Hull recognized during the thirties that the time had passed when the problems of Latin America could or should be solved by sending a contingent of U.S. Marines. And so Cordell Hull, displaying the wisdom and foresight of which all Tennesseans are proud, launched our good neighbor policy, designed to promote our economic and cultural ties with our Latin American friends on the basis of cooperative effort beneficial both to us and to them. The Cordell Hull good neighbor policy must remain the cornerstone of our Latin American policy. We can and we must deal with the Cuban situation within the framework of that policy.

The admirable qualities of patience and forbearance which have characterized our policy with respect to Castro have served their purpose. But patience and forbearance are no longer sufficient. Such a policy, standing alone, no longer serves the interests of either the United States or of the Cuban people.

Day by day the situation in Cuba becomes increasingly ominous. Economic ties with the Soviet Union, publicly proclaimed, are coupled with rumors of prospective military ties and with outright hostile acts against U.S. naval forces.

We must take into consideration the possibility of the establishment of Russian military bases on Cuban soil. I am not now predicting that such will occur. But so far as I am concerned the establishment of a Russian missile base, air base, or naval base in Cuba would constitute a violation of the Monroe Doctrine under which the United States has for a century and a half made clear our determination to repel any effort by any outside predatory nation to engulf any part of the Western Hemisphere. Neither Castro nor Khrushchev should be left in any doubt as to the consequences of such action.

Three months ago, in a speech on the floor of the U.S. Senate, I sounded a clear warning that a revision of United States-Cuban policy was required. I pointed out then, as I point out now, that it is not enough merely to deplore the extreme measures being taken by Castro. It is not enough merely to deny his outrageous charges against the United States. We need more than a negative policy. We must formulate and implement a positive program of action.

By positive action I do not mean sending the Marines. Nor do I suggest that our Government should wage unrestricted economic warfare against the Cuban people. On the contrary, we must proceed in concert with other Latin American countries whose stability and security are at stake and against some of which Castro has already deliberately sought to stir up dissension and revolt.

Building upon the Cordell Hull good neighbor policy, we took the lead in establishing the Organization of American States as a vehicle for solving mutual problems through cooperative effort. Recently our Government presented to OAS a well documented complaint exposing Castro's deliberate anti-United States campaign. But here again it is not enough merely to make clear what has occurred. We must propose within the OAS a positive course of action to be undertaken under the auspices of OAS in the interests of peace and security.

I urge President Eisenhower to take such action. Consideration should also be given to using the facilities of the United Nations to forestall action which would imperil world peace, as Castro's attitude becomes increasingly belligerent and threatening.

The Congress should give to the President the authority to revise Cuban sugar quotas with the understanding that this authority will be used, if at all, not as an act of economic hostility against the Cuban people, but only if the exigencies of the situation require it, and certainly our other friends in OAS should be consulted about this.

Action by our Government to counter the threat of the Castro brand of communism should be taken promptly and after deliberate consideration. We can no longer safely rely on the hope that Castro will collapse or disappear if we merely continue to turn the other cheek.

SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS TAX RETIREMENT ACT OF 1960

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks a statement in regard to H.R. 10.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD OF VIRGINIA

I wish to make a short statement for the record relative to H.R. 10 which is generally referred to as a "bill to encourage the establishment of voluntary pension plans by self-employed individuals."

I could not support this bill as it was passed by the House of Representatives. But amendments adopted by the Senate Finance Committee removed the principal objections.

Objectionable features in the bill as it was passed by the House included the following provisions:

(1) It gave tax advantages for the exclusive benefit of employers.

(2) It did not require establishing nondiscriminatory plans covering eligible employees.

(3) It created substantial tax differences between self-employed retirement programs and corporate qualified pension plans.

(4) It established an undesirable precedent allowing individual tax deductions for retirement savings.

(5) It involved a revenue loss of approximately $365 million a year.

As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, I requested the Treasury Department, in cooperation with the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, to search for a better approach to the treatment of the retirement savings of self-employed people.

The bill now before the Senate is the result of that dual study. It also reflects new information developed through the committee hearings held in May of this year.

The Treasury estimates that the revenue cost of extending retirement plans coverage to self-employed under this amended bill will range between $150 million and $250 million annually, as compared with $365 million under the bill as passed by the House.

And in this connection, this cost is to be offset in considerable measure by an anticipated increase in revenue resulting from changes in the corporate area.

Without going into details the pending bill, as amended by the Finance Committee, differs from the bill as it passed the House in the following major respects:

(1) Self-employed may participate in their own qualified pension plan only if the plan includes their employees—and is nondiscriminatory as to coverage, contributions, and benefits.

(2) The basic deduction allowable each year is patterned on the original H.R. 10 formula—10 percent of earnings up to $2,500 a year. However, the Senate Finance Committee bill uses "earned income" as the base, which generally would be less than "self-employment income" used in the original version.

(3) The basic formula of 10 percent of earned income up to $2,500 is not increased for persons over 50 years of age. The original version raised the percentage and dollar limitations between years 50 and 70.

(4) The original bill contained a total lifetime limitation of $50,000 for contributions on behalf of each self-employed person. This limitation has been eliminated in view of other restrictions inserted in the amended bill.

There is another aspect of the committee bill which should be mentioned. It places additional restrictions on corporate pension plans when a covered employee is owner of more than 10 percent of the corporation's stock. This would prevent unwarranted tax advantages for a few individual stockholders.

The Finance Committee report on this bill supports the belief that it is in the public interest to extend coverage of individuals under voluntary retirement plan as a means of discouraging complete reliance on local, State or Federal government for assistance.

The same general privileges and restrictions should apply, whether plans are established by proprietors, partnerships or corporations.

It is for this reason that the committee bill provides that self-employed persons may participate in their own qualified pension plan only if the plan includes their employees—and with respect to employees the plan shall be nondiscriminatory, percentagewise, as to coverage, contributions and benefits.

The best information available to the committee indicated some 20 million persons would be affected by this bill—10 million self-employed, and 10 million employees of the self-employed.

Representatives of the self-employed persons throughout the Nation have been seeking this type of legislation since 1951, and various bills which should accomplish this purpose have been introduced over the past 10 years.

I believe the committee bill is the best approach to the problem proposed to date. It will reach individuals in a wide variety of trades and professions in a reasonable manner and within a pattern already existing in the Internal Revenue Code.

Under these circumstances I am prepared to support the bill (H.R. 10) as amended and reported by the Senate Finance Committee.

GLORIA ANNE LOVEDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1524, H.R. 7895.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 7895) for the relief of Gloria Anne Loveday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is to enable Gloria Anne Loveday to qualify for an immigrant visa under the quota for Great Britain, of which country she is a citizen.

It was objected to on the calendar, but objection has since been removed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill (H.R. 7895) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN PROPERTY IN THE CITY OF FLANDREAU, S. DAK.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1691, Senate bill 2709.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2709) directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the city of Flandreau, S. Dak., any interest remaining in the United States to certain property which it conveyed to such city by the act of August 21, 1916.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the bill was called on the calendar. Objection was made on the ground that it did not comply with the Morse formula. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] has an amendment embodying the Morse formula which he proposes to offer.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk in behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike out ", without consideration,". At the end of the bill it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. 2. The conveyance authorized by the first section of this Act shall be conditional upon the State of South Dakota paying to the United States 50 per centum of the fair market value, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of any interest (including any reversionary interest) held by the United States in the property conveyed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MUNDT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF ADMINISTRATION OF OVERSEA ACTIVITIES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1710, H.R. 7758.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 7758) to improve the administration of oversea activities of the Government of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, with amendments, on page 5, at the beginning of line 3, to insert "The head of the Government agency concerned may, in accordance with regulations of the President, waive in whole or in part any right of recovery under this section, if it is shown that such recovery would be against equity and good conscience or against the public interest."; on page 7, line 14, after the word "of", to strike out "transportation" and insert "travel"; on page 8, line 6, after the word "The", to strike out "cost of transporting" and insert "travel expenses of"; in line 16, after the word "Act", to strike out "transportation" and insert "travel expenses"; on page 24, line 9, after "443", to strike out "901 (1) and (2),"; in line 12, after "888", to strike out "1131,", and on page 27, after line 10, to insert:

(7) Section 901 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1131), is amended to read as follows:

"REPRESENTATION ALLOWANCES

"SEC. 901. In accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe and notwithstanding the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 70), the Secretary is authorized to grant to any officer or employee of the Service who is a citizen of the United States allowances in order to provide for the proper representation of the United States by officers or employees of the Service."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from South Carolina will explain the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The purpose of the bill is to improve and strengthen Government oversea activities by establishing a uniform system for compensating all Government employees in oversea posts irrespective of the agency by which they are employed. The bill would provide uniformity of treatment for all oversea employees to the extent justified by relative conditions of employment. Current applicable laws do not provide this uniformity.

The committee has very carefully studied the provisions of the bill and has unanimously reported it to the Senate. It was requested by the administration.

Mr. CARLSON. The chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service has accurately stated the purposes of the bill. It has the approval of every agency of Government. I sincerely hope it will be passed.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is what I was going to inquire about. Does it have the approval of the State Department?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Yes. The administration sent the bill to us, and they recommended it. We introduced it at their request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H.R. 7758) was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

REVISION AND CODIFICATION OF TITLE 39, UNITED STATES CODE, ENTITLED "THE POSTAL SERVICE"

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1834, H.R. 2339.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 2339), to revise, codify, and enact into law, title 39, of the United States Code, entitled "The Postal Service."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the bill would revise, codify, and reenact the laws relating to the postal service. It has twice passed the House, once in the 85th Congress, and again in this Congress. We inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a notice of a hearing by the Subcommittee on Revision and Codification of the Committee on the Judiciary, notifying all interested persons of the hearing on the bill. All persons who requested a hearing by the subcommittee were consulted. All of their suggestions have been accepted or reconciled, with the consent of the postal authorities.

The postal laws have not been codified for approximately 90 years. The bill brings forward and codifies the postal laws in one place. I have been assured by the General Counsel for the Post Office Department that there has been no change of substance in the proposed codification, and that this codification merely eliminates some statutes which have become obsolete with the passage of the years, and rephrases in simpler language some of the most difficult passages in the laws relating to the public service, but makes no substantive change in the laws.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I merely wish the RECORD to show that whenever I see a bill whose purpose is to revise and codify and enact into law certain statutes which are already on the books, with only what we call slight revision and no substantive change, I am always suspicious.

The reason why I am suspicious is that every codification of law that we have had in the last 8 years has had a few sneakers in it.

While I shall not debate the issue at this time, I wish to be recorded as being against the bill. It is not because I do not have faith in the Senator from North Carolina. He is a distinguished and able Senator, and I would very much like to accept his expression of faith in the bill. However, he relies upon the General Counsel for the Post Office Department, and the General Counsel for the Post Office Department wrote some words in connection with the bill which are subject to some interpretation. I believe he said that there was no substantive change——

Mr. ERVIN. No change of substance.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No change of substance. What was the "but" phrase?

Mr. ERVIN. The General Counsel declares that the codification under consideration merely eliminates some statutes which have become obsolete with the passage of the years, and in some instances rewrites some of the old statutes so as to make them simpler. That is the assurance I have received from the General Counsel. That is the conclusion the House committee came to after passing on the matter twice, once at this session and once in a previous Congress. I made numerous spot checks. I will not guarantee to the Senator from Minnesota or anyone else that a bill of this magnitude does not make any change in any of its sections.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand.

Mr. ERVIN. I have done the best I could to spot check various sections of the bill, and the staff has interviewed all the interested parties, including those who have interests adverse to those of the Post Office Department. From all the assurances and from my own spot checks I am satisfied that this bill constitutes a mere codification and that its enactment is necessary, because a codification of these laws has not been made in about 88 years.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understood the Senator to say that he had contacted parties or persons who had what might be called in legal terminology an adverse interest.

Mr. ERVIN. Such as the American Railway Express Co.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Individuals or companies who do not have the same position as the Post Office Department, and they have no objections.

Mr. ERVIN. In the case of objections, those things have been ironed out.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The other day in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, we had before us a sort of recodification of the Farm Home Administration Act. When we got down to it with a microscope and started to examine the fine print—like one of those old-fashioned insurance policies, before the Hughes investigation around 1915, or whenever it was—we found some language in it which literally did not conform with the express purposes of the act.

Every time I hear the word recodification or codification, it reminds me of a cod, and whenever we have that kind of cod lying around here, it begins to smell bad.

However, I will take the Senator's word for it, because I know he is meticulous. At the same time I wish to raise a flag of caution to my colleagues. I make a wager right now that before long we will find that the recodification was not merely a normal gathering together of the children into the fold, but that something else happened along the way. I thank the Senator for his explanation.

Mr. ERVIN. Since the bill passed the House, a number of technical errors have been discovered, and there are a large number of Senate committee amendments curing these technical errors. To save the expense of printing, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments, which are technical in form, be not printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This is a course of action which has been taken on several occasions on codification bills.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments not be printed in the RECORD.

I further ask unanimous consent that the amendments be voted upon en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina that the amendments not be printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Is there objection to the consideration of the amendments en bloc? The Chair hears none, and the amendments are agreed to en bloc.

The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H.R. 2339) was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HILL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PAYMENTS TO BERNALILLO COUNTY, N. MEX., FOR FURNISHING HOSPITAL CARE FOR CERTAIN INDIANS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 11545.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the bill (H.R. 11545) to amend the act of October 31, 1949, with respect to payments to Bernalillo County, N. Mex., for furnishing hospital care for certain Indians, which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement explaining the purpose of the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The legislation is in the nature of emergency legislation.

The construction of the Bernalillo County Hospital was authorized by Public Law 438, 81st Congress, as a joint venture between the Federal Government and Bernalillo County, State of New Mexico. The Federal Government contributed $1,500,000 and the land, while Bernalillo County provided such additional funds as were required to complete the construction and equipping of the hospital.

Public Law 438 stipulated that the county make available when required not less than 100 beds for Indians; it further provided for reimbursing the county of Bernalillo for hospital and medical services to Indians at rates not in excess of the annual per diem cost of operation and maintenance of the entire hospital, but in no event was the amount of such payment to be less than the average per diem cost of operation and maintenance for 80 percent of the beds required to be made available. The 100 beds made available at the hospital for the care of Indians are needed to provide such care pending the completion of the construction of a proposed new Indian hospital at Gallup, N. Mex. The requirement under Public Law 438, 81st Congress (which was extended until June 30, 1906, by Public Law 249, 85th Cong.), that the amount of the payment made to the Bernalillo County Hospital shall in no event be less than the average annual per diem cost of operation and maintenance for 80 percent of the beds required to be made available for Indians is due to expire on June 30, 1960.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has informed the committee that average occupancy by Indians has exceeded 80 percent of the 100 beds required to be made available. Until completion of the Gallup Hospital, bed utilization is expected to continue at a rate in excess of 80 percent. The bill, as passed by the House, would extend until June 30, 1961, the provision for minimum payment, while not affecting the authority to make payments on a per diem basis for beds actually occupied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill (H.R. 11545) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATE DEPARTMENT'S REORGANIZATION OF DISARMAMENT OFFICE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter I received recently from Mr. William Macomber, Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Affairs. The letter gives some specific information about an enlarged office for disarmament in the State Department. This expansion was to take place regardless of whether Congress appropriated some $400,000 for disarmament studies. I am pleased that the Senate has appropriated these vitally needed funds. I hope the funds will be agreed to by the conference committee on the State Department's appropriation.

What is also interesting about the letter from Mr. Macomber is that it states flatly that the reorganization will be completed and fully active by the end of June. Some enterprising reporter ought to write a story on this development, because I believe he and the public would be surprised. I think he will find that the letter at best is unduly optimistic. There is, to be sure, office space allocated for an expansion of the disarmament office, but to my knowledge the additional rooms, as yet, have no occupants. Perhaps when Congress reconvenes in August I shall have more of a progress report to issue.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 17, 1960.

The Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: The Secretary of State had already left town for a brief period of leave when we received your letter of June 9, 1960, raising certain questions with respect to our plans and budget for the establishment of a special disarmament organization. It has been discussed with him on the telephone and he has asked me to respond to it on his behalf.

In our fiscal year 1961 budget submission now pending with the Congress it was stated: "One of our most serious deficiencies in the approach to disarmament has been the absence of orderly planning to meet the highly technical and complex problems which face the United States in the general field of disarmament. The rapid and continuing changes in weapons systems make it imperative that the U.S. Government establish disarmament planning and studies on a permanent basis to provide continuing analysis and review of disarmament policy in the light of developments in the political, economic, military and technical fields.

"A review of the U.S. disarmament policy has been undertaken by a Joint Disarmament Study Group, headed by Mr. Charles A. Coolidge. The Coolidge study to date clearly indicates the necessity for a continuing disarmament planning and studies group with staff contributed by State, Defense, AEC, CIA and other appropriate agencies. It is hoped that this group would be assisted by outside agencies. Upon the completion of this present study, 13 positions, contributed to the joint study by the Department of State will be used to form the nucleus of a permanent study group with continuing staff contributions from other agencies. An additional five positions are required for fiscal year 1961 to provide a permanent study director and supporting staff. These positions consist of a GS–18 study director, three GS–15 officers and one secretary. In addition, the fiscal year 1961 budget request includes an increase of $400,000 to be expended for disarmament studies and $43,270 for the employment and travel of technical consultants.

Since this budget document was prepared last fall, our plans with respect to disarmament organization have continued to evolve. It is our present belief that the organization should be established at a level within the Department high enough to provide the stature necessary for effective interdepartmental leadership. The GS–18 study director mentioned in our budget request no longer reflects the level or kind of position we now have in mind. However, we believe that existing legislative authority available to the executive branch is sufficient to permit the establishment of a senior position such as we have in mind and to support it financially in fiscal year 1961.

The 18 positions referred to in the budget request, together with those which will be contributed by the Department of Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission and possibly other departments and agencies will, we believe, be adequate to launch the new organization. Should experience indicate that additional personnel are required in fiscal year 1961, the Department is prepared to divert personnel and financial resources to this activity.

A nucleus of qualified officers is being established to take the necessary steps to activate the establishment of the disarmament plans and studies organization. It is our hope that the nucleus will be fully activated by the end of June.

The Secretary has asked me to tell you that he will be pleased to discuss this matter with you personally at some mutually convenient time, should you desire. He very much appreciates your interest and support in strengthening the disarmament organization in the executive branch.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

HEALTH CARE FOR THE AGED

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I recently received a letter from Irving Kane, president of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds, urging action by the Senate on legislation to provide health services for the aged through the use of old-age and survivors disability insurance.

I support such legislation and I intend to continue my efforts for Senate approval of legislation along the lines of the Forand bill, the McNamara bill, which I have joined in sponsoring, and my own proposal, S. 1151, to provide hospital and nursing home care through the social security system.

Mr. President, I believe Senators should give very serious attention to Mr. Kane's letter. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COUNCIL OF JEWISH FEDERATIONS AND WELFARE FUNDS, INC.,
New York, N.Y., June 21, 1960.

The Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: I am writing to you in connection with the hearings which the Senate Finance Committee will be holding in reference to the Social Security Act. We are particularly concerned with the problem of providing for the basic and urgent health services for the aged through the use of old-age and survivors disability insurance. We earnestly hope that the Finance Committee will recommend to the Senate a bill to finance such services.

In this connection, our national board of directors, at its meeting on March 20, 1960, unanimously reaffirmed its action of March 15, 1959, on medical care of the aged as follows:

"The board of directors of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds approves in principle the use of the mechanism of the old-age and survivors insurance program for financing an expanded program of health services for persons 65 years and over."

The supporting facts considered by the board revealed that the admission rate of people over 65 to our Jewish hospitals is twice that of younger people, their stay in the hospitals is longer, and many have family incomes of less than $3,000 per year; half the residents of our aged homes are in infirmary or hospital units, and the provision for their extended medical care accounts for the bulk of increased costs and increased deficits. Eighty percent of the residents of our homes for the aged are dependent primarily on public assistance grants or OASDI benefits. Less than 40 percent of all persons over 65 are protected by voluntary health insurance.

The costs of this medical care for the aged places a heavy burden upon our Jewish voluntary agencies, with inadequate resources, which they are unable to meet even while diverting funds from other essential needs. It is the conviction of our health services committee, our public welfare committee, and our board of directors, after considering the various alternatives, with the pros and cons, that Federal responsibility through the use of the OASDI is required. This conclusion is shared by a number of other groups.

Our general assembly has also stated: "These programs [for the aged] are of such magnitude that they require basic governmental as well as voluntary responsibility and financing."

The Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds is the national association of 213 central planning, financing, and budgeting community organizations, embracing virtually all types of Jewish health and welfare responsibilities, and serving almost 800 communities in every part of the United States.

We shall look forward to hearing from you on this vitally important need.

Sincerely,

IRVING KANE,
President.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the St. Paul Council of Churches has written me to support legislation to provide health benefits for elderly persons through social security.

I introduced a bill for this purpose, S. 1151, to provide hospital and nursing home care for older people under social security, and I support similar legislation like the Forand bill, H.R. 4700, and the McNamara bill, S. 3503, which I joined in sponsoring.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. PAUL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES,
St. Paul, Minn., June 29, 1960.

The Honorable HUBERT HUMPHREY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: We are aware of the consideration being given to a plan of medical coverage to aged persons as an extension of social security. This is a matter that concerns all of us very much.

With the increasing number of older persons in our population, and the rising costs of medical care it seems to us that all citizens should share in providing a larger measure of security for these older citizens when they need medical care.

We therefore urge you to use your influence to help secure such legislation at this session of the legislature if possible.

Sincerely yours,

H. C. BRADSHAW,
Executive Secretary.

ENACTMENT OF LANDMARKS IN MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in the closing hours prior to the adjournment, we should not fail to mark two significant milestones in the 86th Congress.

On Thursday, the Senate approved Senate Joint Resolution 41, as amended, to strengthen programs of international cooperation in health research and research training.

Before we will have adjourned, there will be enacted a conference report on this fiscal year's appropriations for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, including what I hope and believe will be a considerably increased sum for the esteemed National Institutes of Health.

Congressional approval of Senate Joint Resolution 41 and of increased funds for NIH demonstrate once again the bold leadership which the 86th Congress has taken in the field of advancing the health of our own people and of mankind.

OPPOSITION FROM EXECUTIVE BRANCH

This leadership has been exercised in the face of what might be termed, at best, grudging acceptance, and at worst, vigorous opposition from the Bureau of the Budget and from certain other quarters in the executive branch.

Federal medical scientists have no doubt virtually unanimously applauded the leadership of Congress. But they have been under stringent directives for support only of a so-called economy position.

Regrettably, as I shall indicate in a moment, that economy position has considerably prevailed with respect to the House amendments to Senate Joint Resolution 41, which dilute its effectiveness.

Congress has, however, advanced the cause of mankind's progress.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR HILL

I am sure that it would be the consensus of Senators that if there is any individual who should be honored for both of these legislative milestones, it is the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

As chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, he broke new ground when he introduced Senate Joint Resolution 41, with the cosponsorship of many Senators, including myself.

As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, he has provided the impetus for increased funds for the National Institutes of Health. The outstanding role of Representative JOHN FOGARTY, chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee, should likewise be mentioned with gratitude from all of us.

ORIGINAL SENATE BILL SUPERIOR

It had been my hope, and I believe that of most or all of the cosponsors of the Senate version of the international research bill, that the Senate bill, as approved—63 to 17—last year, would prevail. We frankly regard it as far superior to House Joint Resolution 649, as approved by the House of Representatives.

First, the Senate version had provided for $50 million authorization for oversea research. Second, it would have created a National Institute for International Medical Research.

This Institute would have been an indispensable framework for specialized knowledge and contacts with oversea medical science.

The House position, in the form of the text of House Joint Resolution 649, has, however, been substituted for the Senate version in the final bill.

The legislation is nonetheless a great forward step.

We should not, for one moment, underestimate the contribution which has been made by Members of the House of Representatives, who studied this subject at great length.

In particular, I pay tribute to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Honorable KENNETH ROBERTS, of Alabama, and to all of his associates in the subcommittee and the full committee who devoted themselves intensively to this problem.

I hope that in the next Congress, with the experience gained under Senate Joint Resolution 41, as enacted, we can progress further by establishing a separate institute in Bethesda to concentrate on the international phases of medical cooperation.

SUBCOMMITTEE STUDY ON INTERNATIONAL HEALTH

I make these observations on the basis of a year and one-half of study of problems of international medical cooperation.

As Senators are aware, it is my privilege to serve as chairman of the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations of the Committee on Government Operations.

Pursuant to Senate Resolution 347, 85th Congress, and Senate Resolutions 42 and 255, section 4, 86th Congress, we have been making a comprehensive survey of international health, research and assistance and rehabilitation programs.

The observations which I offer today are based largely upon the facts which the subcommittee has compiled. I refer to facts on the imperative need for increased international medical cooperation.

But these observations are individual views and not the subcommittee's formal expression. Only in the final report, to be issued by January 31, 1961, will the subcommittee's detailed and formal position be presented.

TENTH COMMITTEE PRINT TO BE ISSUED

In our study, we have issued to date nine publications.

Within a few weeks, there will be released the 10th of our committee prints, entitled "Radiation Research in the Life Sciences."

This brings together, for the first time, facts on the magnitude, organization and distribution of worldwide research on the effects of radiation on man, plants, and animals.

It is not a technical report on radiation as such, for that would be within the province of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Rather, it is a factual survey of what, for example, the nine Federal agencies interested in this problem are doing in research and to what extent.

The report will show that on a worldwide basis, there are some 3,000 research projects now under way, representing around $100 million to $110 million in expenditures.

OTHER SUBCOMMITTEE PUBLICATION

Within a few weeks thereafter, we hope to issue as a committee print a comprehensive budget volume. It will show, agency by agency of the Federal Government, what each agency is spending for research and other medical and health-related programs—where, how, and why.

Not since the reports of the two Hoover Commissions on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government has such complete information on Federal health work been compiled.

In addition, there is and will be available a two-part volume on our hearings. Part I consists of our hearings in Washington and in Europe. Part II, still to be printed, consists of appendixes to the hearings in form of significant exhibits, correspondence, and memorandums.

I mention the subcommittee's work because I believe it can be reliably observed that out study has played a useful role in amassing facts for the Congress, which have been helpful to the vital decisions that I have mentioned earlier.

In the interim report, which we will file, we will set forth a comprehensive account of important changes which have already occurred both nationally and internationally as a result of our efforts.

These changes consist, for example, in improved activity and organization within the executive branch with respect to international biomedical research and assistance.

LIST OF SUBCOMMITTEE PUBLICATIONS

Concerning our series of publications, I have prepared a list of all of those released to date, including an indication as to whether copies may still be obtained from the subcommittee.

In many instances, the supply has been exhausted by thousands of requests. However, some copies can still be purchased from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office.

I ask unanimous consent that this list be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOURCE LIST AND PRICE LIST OF PUBLICATIONS BY THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON REORGANIZATION AND INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS, COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

BOX SCORE ON TEST-BAN TALKS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, several days ago I announced to the Senate that I had requested that a study be made of the status of the Conference on the Discontinuance of Nuclear Weapons Tests. The controversy was still going on on questions such as: Should the talks continue? And, which side was making the greatest effort to reach agreement? It seemed to me that an independent evaluation should be offered as to whether the conference was progressing or whether it was approaching a stalemate.

The study of the talks is now completed and it will be issued within the near future. Today, I wish to present briefly one or two conclusions for the benefit of Senators who have an interest in the subject.

Before giving these conclusions I wish to say something of how the study was undertaken. The Department of State has compiled a list of 25 issues that remain to be resolved before a test-ban treaty can be signed. Some of these issues obviously are more important than others. For example, one issue, which must be ranked of the highest importance, is the number of onsite inspections that may take place in a year. Another issue is whether there should be one or two foreign inspectors on aerial overflights to sample air for radioactivity. This issue, although important, does not rate as high as the onsite inspection problem. The 25 issues were ranked in importance, 1 to 5, No. 1 being the category "most important," followed by "very important," "important," "necessary," and "should be settled."

The entire negotiating history of each item was examined. Notations were made for significant developments on each issue, such as the date in which a specific proposal was made, the side making the proposal, the nature and dates of counterproposals, and the side making the last counterproposal. The cutoff date for the study was early June.

The most obvious conclusion is that neither the United States and the United Kingdom nor the Soviet Union can pose as the side making the most effort to reach agreement. The box score rates both sides fairly even with the edge given to the West. On the introduction of proposals, the Soviet Union introduced first 12 times, the United States 11 times, and on 2 issues neither side has made a move.

On the side making the last move, the Soviet Union has made the last move on 7 issues, the United States on 15 issues, both sides simultaneously offered proposals on 1 issue, and on 2 issues neither side has made any proposal. In terms of which side made the last move the West comes out ahead by having made the last move twice as much as the U.S.S.R. If the issues are totaled on another date these totals are presumably subject to change.

I also wish to point out that neither side has done much negotiating on several issues, some of which are important. They include: First, article on the budget and finance; second, article on the composition of the control commission; third, article on resolution of disputes; fourth, parties to the treaty article; fifth, article on peaceful detonations; sixth, article on privileges and immunities—this is distinct from Annex II: Privileges and Immunities which is almost agreed to; seventh, article on the control system for high-altitude detection; and eighth, article on phasing of the installation of the control system.

THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AND THE JOINT CHIEFS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the proper organization of our Defense Department is vital to our ability to survive as a nation. If our defense organization is inefficient, if our strategic planning processes are ineffective, the Nation's military potential is dangerously impaired. Also, if the philosophy and institutions of our defense organization are not in harmony with our form of government, we will find ourselves in the position of undermining the kind of government and endangering the beliefs which, paradoxically, our military effort is designed to protect.

Therefore, it is essential that our military institutions be both strong, effective, responsive to our strategic requirements, and in harmony with our form of government.

Because I hold these beliefs, I find much reassurance in the actions of the present Secretary of Defense, Thomas S. Gates, Jr., with respect to the Joint Chiefs of Staff system. I doubt if there has been any single action concerning national security organization which has resulted in such widespread acclaim as Secretary Gates' policy of sitting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Support of this policy, which was enunciated in the "Gates' JCS Memorandum" of December 29, 1959, has been voiced by Members of both parties in the House and Senate, the foremost military writers, and a wide cross section of the American press.

The Secretary of Defense's policy of sitting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff has many beneficial effects: It has speeded the decision-making processes in strategic planning at the seat of government; it has made the constitutional principle of civilian control of the military realistic and meaningful; it has provided a persuasive demonstration of the ability of our form of government to devise an effective strategic planning system and thus be able to reject the outmoded, discredited, and defeated single chief of staff—supreme high command methods of monarchial and dictatorial regimes.

I think that it is important that we must realize that a Joint Chiefs of Staff system, such as is utilized by the United States and Great Britain, is a governmental device of major importance. This system, so uniquely appropriate to the democratic form of government must not be casually criticized, or carelessly abandoned. In the whole scope of history of military institutions, the Joint Chiefs of Staff concept is the only system for military planning at the seat of government which possesses superior military effectiveness and at the same time does not clash with the concepts of the type of democratic government it is a part of and supports.

By bringing the uniformed chiefs of the respective services together as members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, this concept achieves an unequaled degree of realism in military planning, and thus avoids the disastrous theorizing of the ivory tower. I am of the firm belief that if today our Nation were confronted with the problem of creating a system for military planning at the seat of government, it would be impossible to provide a method which politically and militarily would equal the Joint Chiefs of Staff system.

Therefore, while I have not been hesitant to criticize the foreign and defense policies of the present administration when I thought such criticism was justified, I do believe that it is only proper to recognize that the present Secretary of Defense, Thomas S. Gates, has made an historic contribution to the defense organization of our Government through his sound and strong policy of sitting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Accordingly, I wish to take this occasion to associate myself with the views of the distinguished Members of both parties of the Senate and House who have also endorsed this action of Secretary Gates.

FEDERAL AID FOR UNDERGRADUATE LANGUAGE AND AREA STUDIES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the March 1960 bulletin of the American Association of University Professors contains an article written by Prof. William Boyer of the University of Pittsburgh entitled "Federal Aid for Undergraduate Language and Area Studies."

Professor Boyer outlines the need for amendment of the National Defense Education Act to promote the study of modern foreign language at the undergraduate, as well as the graduate, level. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in my remarks.

FEDERAL AID FOR UNDERGRADUATE LANGUAGE AND AREA STUDIES

(By William W. Boyer)

Spurred by the first Soviet sputnik, together with revealing appraisals of higher education in the United States, Congress enacted the National Defense Education Act of 1958.[1] The act represents a rather unprecedented selective policy, of considerable scope, of direct Federal subsidization of education. Seemingly a new, and perhaps lasting, bond is thus being forged between the Federal Treasury and higher education.

Important to this discussion are provisions of the act relating to language and area studies. The act authorizes Federal aid for graduate language and area centers and for strengthening foreign-language instruction in elementary and secondary schools. It is here proposed that, to further advance the national interest, Federal aid be extended to include undergraduate language and area studies.

PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

The stated purpose of the act is "to strengthen the national defense and to encourage and assist in the expansion and improvement of educational programs to meet critical national needs." Of the 10 titles of the act, titles III, IV, and VI are significant to language and area studies. Title IV, National Defense Fellowships, is general and authorizes fellowships for qualified graduate students, with no restrictions as to their fields of study. Title III provides Federal financial assistance under State plans for strengthening instruction in modern foreign languages, among other subjects, in both public and nonprofit elementary and secondary schools. Title VI: Language Development, authorizes the Commissioner of Education to contract with higher educational institutions for two kinds of activity—(1) centers where expanded and improved instruction will be offered in certain critical modern foreign languages and also, in many cases, in related area studies; and (2) institutes where advanced instruction will be offered for eligible individuals engaged in, or preparing to engage in, the teaching of a modern foreign language in elementary or secondary schools, as well as for supervisors or trainers of such teachers. Stipends are available to qualified individuals attending either such a center or such an institute.

While title III is aimed at elementary and secondary education, a publication of the Office of Education makes it apparent that title VI is aimed at graduate centers as distinguished from undergraduate language and area programs. Thus, the publication states:

"While the principal emphasis of a center will be upon advanced study, academically promising undergraduates may be encouraged to enter some of the center courses for undergraduate credit at their own expense, providing course standards are not affected." [2]

For a graduate center to receive Federal aid for the teaching of any modern foreign language, title VI specifies that the Commissioner of Education must determine "(1) that individuals trained in such language are needed by the Federal Government or by business, industry, or education in the United States, and (2) that adequate instruction in such language is not readily available in the United States." [3]

The goals of the pertinent provisions of the act, therefore, are to provide teachers, as well as specialists for government service and other public interests, who are well qualified in critical modern foreign languages and related area studies. The act thus recognizes our national interest and direction involving cultures other than our own, and the critical national need for more adequately meeting the world commitments thrust upon our society. Were Federal aid extended to include undergraduate language and area programs and students, the Federal program increasingly would relate our national interest and needs to higher educational efforts of growing intercultural significance.

AIMS OF A LIBERAL EDUCATION

Among such current efforts are the establishment and expansion of foreign language instruction and related area studies within undergraduate liberal arts curriculums. A number of institutions (Colgate University, for example) require all liberal arts undergraduates to fulfill the core curriculum requirement of studying a foreign language, together with area studies related to that language.

Increasingly, by definition, an undergraduate liberal education has become international and intercultural in dimensions. Donald C. Stone has expressed this concept as follows:

"Since education is concerned with the search for knowledge and truths which are universal in character, all liberal education is in some degree international in scope and concern.

"The function of American colleges and universities is to develop educated men and women. Higher education is concerned with the pursuit of knowledge, the search for truth, the cultivation of wisdom in regard to the nature of man, his society, and the world in which he lives, and with enabling man to realize his potentialities both individually and collectively. The basic function of education is thus of necessity universal or international in its character.[4]"

It can be said, then, that both the requisites of a liberal education, in our highly interdependent world, and the interests of the Nation motivate the interculturalization of undergraduate curriculums. Accordingly, it is important that the Federal program be expanded to relate the national interest to this realistic and urgent concept of an undergraduate liberal education.

Many authorities agree that the late teens and early twenties comprise those years when a person readily learns foreign languages. It would seem that the Federal program, also, should reflect this important consideration. More than ever before, educators now recognize that increasing our national level of foreign language and area proficiencies depends on instruction of students younger than those engaged in graduate study. In partial response to this recognition, the National Defense Education Act provides Federal aid for foreign language instruction in elementary and secondary schools.

When the Federal program for language instruction is viewed as a whole, it is clear that only the undergraduate level of education remains to be aided. Extending Federal aid to that level will also benefit the lower levels, for most elementary and secondary teachers never attain graduate status and must depend, therefore, wholly on their undergraduate preparation. The graduate level would benefit, too, for graduate centers cannot expand their programs without additional students who have matriculated from related undergraduate programs. Expanded undergraduate language student enrollments would provide needed human resources for the federally aided graduate centers.

Though still existing, disparities between world developments and our undergraduate curriculums are being reduced. With the emergence of the new nations of Asia, including Communist China with about one-fourth of the world population, it becomes almost a national imperative that our undergraduate curriculums increasingly focus on Asian studies, including particularly Chinese language instruction. Far Eastern undergraduate programs now exist in some 10 universities, among which is the University of Pittsburgh. From its inception several years ago, this Pittsburgh program has been integrated within the liberal arts curriculum.[5] With a third year of Chinese language instruction added in the fall of 1959, students studying this language at the university have numbered 10 to 15 each year, an enrollment representing at least 5 percent of the national total of approximately 200 undergraduates who study Chinese annually.

Graduates of our Nation's undergraduate Far Eastern programs usually enroll in well-established graduate centers or are employed by Government agencies critically needing such personnel. Insofar as these and similar undergraduate language and area programs are commensurate with critical national needs, they merit expansion and improvement and hence the support of Federal aid.

NEEDS OF FEDERAL AGENCIES

Equally important as providing more teachers for area and language studies are the personnel needs of several of our National Government agencies which function abroad. Much has been written of the Soviet challenge in this respect. We are told that Russia does not send government personnel abroad who are not fully competent to speak and write the native languages of the countries to which they are assigned.

Partly in response to this Soviet challenge, several Federal agencies maintain in-service language and area study training programs. Perhaps none is so well developed as the Foreign Service Institute of the State Department. The Central Intelligence Agency, however, has proceeded even beyond in-service training. So crucial are its needs that the CIA has felt it necessary, under its language development program, to provide cash awards for employees who learn a language, and annual payments for those who maintain or increase their language competence. Awards range from $50 to $400 for Nordic and Romance languages; from $100 to $800 for 26 different tongues including Russian, Hindi, Urdu, and Swahili; from $200 to $1,200 for Chinese, Japanese, and Korean. Employees who learn a language during off-duty hours receive twice the amount that is received by those who acquire languages during duty hours.

The general objectives of this CIA language program are:

First, that personnel should have a working knowledge of at least one or more of the widely spoken languages—such as French, German, Spanish, and Russian. Not only would this language ability prove valuable in day-to-day work, but it would increase understanding of foreign peoples and ideas.

Second, that a pool of individuals who together would have competence in all of the languages of the world should be developed. This took account of the unexpected needs that can arise for linguists, as well as daily demands. It also recognized the value in making friends by being able to speak to people in their own tongue.

Third, the program was to be directed not only in developing a language competence, but, equally important, at encouraging all personnel to maintain their language ability.[6]

At least two significant implications may be drawn from the CIA program: (1) Given its vital mission of coordinating all intelligence activities related to our national security, the CIA language program is an index of the urgent national needs for persons competent in foreign languages and areas. Obviously, had our higher educational programs—undergraduate as well as graduate—been responding to such national needs by their curriculum offerings, such an extraordinarily elaborate incentives program as the CIA's would not have been essential. (2) Of all foreign areas in which competence is most urgent, Asia is foremost.

CONCLUSION

Congress should amend the National Defense Education Act to provide Federal aid to undergraduate language and area programs, to assist students enrolled in such programs, and thus broaden the concept of liberal education to reflect new world developments and our national involvement in them. Specifically needed are amendments that would: (1) expressly authorize the Commissioner of Education to enter into contracts with higher educational institutions for Federal assistance for critical undergraduate language and area studies, especially those which exist within a liberal arts curriculum; (2) authorize stipends for students enrolled in such programs; (3) provide national defense scholarships for qualified undergraduates, at least those who are accepted for enrollment in undergraduate language and area programs, both new and expanded; and (4) appropriate necessary funds.

These amendments would adequately serve the cause of peace through strengthening national security, and would enrich our society as well.

ARBITRATION IN SETTLEMENT OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT DISPUTES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court have strengthened greatly, in my opinion, the value of arbitration as a means of settling labor-management disputes.

In these cases, the Court has refused, in effect, to second-guess the arbitrator on the merits of his decision, and it has given broad, rather than narrow, jurisdiction to the arbitration clause in collective bargaining contracts.

Before these decisions were handed down, however, the National Academy of Arbitrators had drafted a proposed U.S. Arbitration Act. It was described by Leo C. Brown, S.J., president of the academy, as necessary "to meet certain problems which have developed with respect to the labor arbitration process, particularly in connection with the question of judicial review of agreements to arbitrate and of arbitration awards."

Father Brown points to a 1957 Supreme Court decision holding that arbitration agreements are enforcible by the Federal courts under section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act.

Litigation—

He said—

arising as the aftermath of that decision has made clear the possibility that case-by-case development of law in this field presents dangers of serious impairment of the effectiveness of the arbitration process.

This statement was forwarded to me by Father Brown in a letter of April 18, 1960. I think that some of the fears of the National Academy of Arbitrators have been allayed by the decisions of the Court handed down on June 20 of this year.

It is the position of the academy, and I quote again from Reverend Brown:

Section 5 of the proposed act represents the academy's position on the crucial question of whether an issue of arbitrability should be decided by the arbitrator or by a court. This position is that questions of arbitrability should, unless the contract provides otherwise, be submitted in the first instance to the arbitrator for determination, subject then to subsequent judicial review within the limits prescribed in the statute.

On June 20, 1960, in United Steelworkers against Warrior and Gulf Navigation Co., Justice Douglas said for the Court:

The Congress, however, has by section 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act, assigned the courts the duty of determining whether the reluctant party has breached his promise to arbitrate. For arbitration is a matter of contract and a party cannot be required to submit to arbitration any dispute which he has not agreed so to submit. Yet, to be consistent with congressional policy in favor of settlement of disputes by the parties through the machinery of arbitration, the judicial inquiry under section 301 must be strictly confined to the question of whether the reluctant party did agree to arbitrate the grievance or agreed to give the arbitrator power to make the award he made. An order to arbitrate the particular grievance should not be denied unless it may be said with positive assurance that the arbitration clause is not susceptible to an interpretation that covers the asserted dispute. Doubts should be resolved in favor of coverage.

A footnote at this point states:

It is clear under both the agreement in this case and that involved in American Manufacturing Co., the question of arbitrability is for the courts to decide. * * * Where the assertion by the claimant is that the parties excluded from court determination not merely the decision of the merits of the grievance but also the question of its arbitrability, vesting power to make both decisions in the arbitrator, the claimant must bear the burden of a clear demonstration of that purpose.

Thus, these decisions are not on the direct point of who decides the question of arbitrability because the agreements made clear that the courts did. But the implication that the arbitrator could be vested with that power is clear.

Then in United Steelworkers of America against Enterprise Wheel and Car Corp., the collective-bargaining agreement provided:

It is understood and agreed that neither party will institute civil suits or legal proceedings against the other for alleged violation of any of the provisions of this labor contract; instead all disputes will be settled in the manner outlined in this article III, adjustment of grievances.

When the respondent refused to arbitrate a dispute arising from the discharge of an employee, suit was brought for specific enforcement of the arbitration provision of the agreement. The district court ordered arbitration; respondent refused to comply with the award. The district court directed the respondent to comply.

In the court of appeals, it was agreed that the district court had jurisdiction to enforce an arbitration award under a collective-bargaining agreement, but held that the award was unenforcible because the collective agreement had expired.

The Supreme Court decision stated:

The court of appeal's opinion refusing to enforce the reinstatement and partial back pay portions of the award was not based upon any finding that the arbitrator did not premise his award on his construction of the contract. It merely disagreed with the arbitrator's construction of it. * * *

As we there emphasized (in United Steelworkers of America v. American Manufacturing Co.) the question of interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement is a question for the arbitrator. It is the arbitrator's construction which was bargained for; and so far as the arbitrator's decision concerns construction of the contract, the courts have no business overruling him because their interpretation of the contract is different from his.

Again, this decision is not squarely on the point raised by Father Brown, but it tends to uphold the right of the arbitrator to decide what the bargaining agreement assigns to him for decision. Even so, the Congress should look into the need for legislation on this point.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks a "Statement on Behalf of the National Academy of Arbitrators Concerning a Proposed United States Labor Arbitration Act," and the text of this bill draft.

There being no objection, the statement and draft of bill were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF ARBITRATORS CONCERNING A PROPOSED UNITED STATES LABOR ARBITRATION ACT

The accompanying proposal for a United States Labor Arbitration Act is submitted for public consideration by the National Academy of Arbitrators. It represents the considered judgment of the members of the academy that Federal legislation is required to meet certain problems which have developed with respect to the labor arbitration process, particularly in connection with the question of judicial review of agreements to arbitrate and of arbitration awards.

Several years ago, after initial consideration of this subject, the academy formally decided not to take an official position in the matter. This decision was reopened, however, after the determination by the Supreme Court in 1957 that collectively bargained agreements to arbitrate grievances are constitutionally enforcible by the Federal courts under section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act. Litigation arising as the aftermath of that decision has made clear the possibility that case-by-case development of law in this field presents dangers of serious impairment of the effectiveness of the arbitration process.

The academy's committee on law and legislation was accordingly instructed to prepare a proposal for a Federal labor arbitration statute. The committee carried its assignment through a series of drafts, the last of these being submitted to the entire membership of the academy for review. Acting on authorization from the membership, the board of governors unanimously approved this final proposal on January 30, 1960. In taking this action, the board noted the differences in views among academy members regarding some of the details of the proposal, but, more significantly, the virtual unanimity of the membership with respect to its essential features.

Section 5 of the proposed act represents the academy's position on the crucial question of whether an issue of arbitrability should be decided by the arbitrator or by a court. This position is that questions of arbitrability should, unless the contract provides otherwise, be submitted in the first instance to the arbitrator for determination, subject then to subsequent judicial review within the limits prescribed in the statute.

The proposed act recognizes that this issue of arbitrability will in some instances be raised initially in a judicial proceeding. The proposal made here is that in such cases the judicial determination should be only whether there has been a valid underlying agreement by the parties to arbitrate; if so, whether either party has defaulted on its obligations under such agreement; and, if such agreement be found and no default, that the court should remand any question of arbitrability of the specific issue to the arbitrator for decision in the first instance.

This proposal reflects firmly held convictions about what is necessary to maintain the integrity of free, private collective bargaining. When a company and a union agree upon the rules to govern their industrial community, including agreement that they will settle their disputes by arbitration, it is vital to the maintenance of their relationship on its most fundamental terms that this agreement be preserved. It is not preserved if either party may, seeking advantage in a particular dispute, turn to a different forum from the one agreed upon. Private collective bargaining assumes the original determination of this question by the parties' own agency of arbitration, with the right to resort to the courts kept in reserve as a function not of original determination but only of review.

The academy proposal provides specifically for summary judicial proceedings to determine questions of arbitrability whenever this is expressly provided for in a particular collective bargaining agreement. Such a procedure undermines, in the judgment of many, the usefulness of the arbitration process. Yet this is a matter to be left to the decision of particular parties.

The academy proposal is limited to the area of labor-management arbitration, and does not include the arbitration of commercial disputes. It differs in this respect, among others, from the Uniform Arbitration Act proposed by the Commissioners of Uniform Laws and by the house of delegates of the American Bar Association. There is also the difference that the academy proposal is for a Federal statute rather than for State enactments. The identification of Federal jurisdiction over labor-management arbitration agreements (in sec. 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act) virtually necessitates the specialized Federal approach here.

LEO C. BROWN, S.J.,
President, National Academy of Arbitrators.

UNITED STATES LABOR ARBITRATION ACT

An act to provide for the judicial enforcement of agreements to arbitrate labor disputes arising in industries affecting commerce and to define the jurisdiction of the courts with reference to the arbitration of such disputes

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

(a) This Act may be cited as the "United States Labor Arbitration Act".

(b) The Congress hereby finds that the refusal by employers or labor organizations in industries affecting commerce to abide by the terms of agreements to arbitrate labor disputes or to honor awards made pursuant thereto burdens commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce and leads to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of goods in commerce.

The Congress hereby finds further that the voluntary arbitration of disputes between employers and labor organizations, particularly disputes arising under collective bargaining agreements, is an accepted and approved method of settling such disputes. Such method, being voluntary and, itself, the result of collective bargaining, should be encouraged and supported. In view of the wide variety of collectively negotiated kinds of arbitration procedures in use, the parties to collective bargaining agreements should continue to have the greatest degree of freedom to shape their arbitration procedures to suit their needs and desires, subject only to limitations which are essential to preserve the integrity of the process, to provide safeguards against improper usurpation of authority by the arbitrator, and to insure the opportunity for full and fair consideration of the issues involved. Judicial intervention in the process should be minimized, but should be available, where necessary, to enforce compliance with agreements to arbitrate, to prevent the assumption of arbitral jurisdiction where a valid agreement to arbitrate does not exist, to enforce awards, and to provide for limited judicial review of awards.

(c) It is the purpose and policy of this Act, in order to promote the free flow of commerce and to remove burdens and obstructions thereto, to provide for the judicial enforcement of agreements to arbitrate labor disputes in industries affecting commerce and to define the jurisdiction of the courts with reference to the arbitration of such disputes.

SEC. 2. As used, in this Act—

(a) The term "employer" includes any person acting as an agent of an employer, directly or indirectly, but shall not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation, or any Federal Reserve bank, or any State or political subdivision thereof, or any corporation or association operating a hospital, if no part of the net earnings inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual, or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or any labor organization (other than when acting as an employer), or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

(b) The term "employee" shall include individuals employed as supervisors, but shall not include any individual employed by an employer subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or by any other person who is not an employer as herein defined.

(c) The term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

(d) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

(e) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

(f) The term "agreement to arbitrate" means a written agreement between a labor organization or organizations and an employer or employers or an association or group of employers, in an industry affecting commerce, to submit to arbitration an existing dispute, or a collective bargaining agreement providing for the arbitration of any or all future disputes.

(g) The term "collective bargaining-agreement" means a written agreement between a labor organization or organizations and an employer or employers or an association or group of employers, in an industry affecting commerce, concerning rates of pay, wages, hours or other terms and conditions of employment.

(h) The term "district court" means United States district court.

(i) The term "arbitrator" means the arbitrator or arbitrators designated pursuant to the agreement to arbitrate or under this Act.

NOTE.—The above provision incorporates the following changes from section 2 of the second draft:

((1) The terms "employer" and "labor organization" are expressly defined in the same manner as in the NLRA, rather than by reference as in the second draft. The purpose of this change is to insure that, even if the NLRA were amended so as to exclude some categories of employers and labor organizations from the coverage of the Act, the Arbitration Act would still have as broad an application as possible.

((2) A definition of the term "employee" is added [as subsection (b)] in order to insure that the Act would apply to aribitration agreements between employers and organizations representing supervisory employees.

((3) In subsection (f) a slight change is made so as to make it clear that "an agreement to arbitrate" is either a specific arbitration submission agreement, or a collective bargining agreement containing an arbitration clause.)

SEC. 3. VALIDITY AND ENFORCEABILITY OF AGREEMENT TO ARBITRATE.—An agreement to arbitrate shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract.

(NOTE.—Academy committee opinion has been divided on the question whether a statute should be applicable unless the parties specifically agree otherwise, or, on the other hand, should be inapplicable (except for the provision making arbitration agreements enforceable) unless the parties agree to accept the statute. This is the so-called "contracting out" problem.

(The recently decided Lincoln Mills case (353 U.S. 448) makes arbitration agreements enforceable in the Federal courts in all cases where there is the necessary relationship to interstate commerce, and holds that the Federal courts are to develop, from all available sources, a body of Federal law to be applied in the resolution of substantive and procedural problems in the enforcement of such agreements. To incorporate a "contracting in or out" provision in a proposed Federal statute would border on the ridiculous, for it would invite Congress on the one hand to pass a law resolving problems of arbitration procedure and substance, and, on the other hand, permit the parties, by force of their own disavowal of the statute, to require the Federal courts to proceed to develop rules as if the statute did not exist.

(For this reason the Act, as proposed, omits any "contracting in or out" provision. A majority of the committee members who have made comments approve this omission.)

SEC. 4. JURISDICTION OF THE ARBITRATOR.—The arbitrator's authority to determine any controversy shall, unless the parties by their agreement have expressly provided for prior judicial determination, include the authority initially to determine any issue raised regarding his jurisdiction, subject to judicial stay, review or intervention only on the grounds provided in sections 5, 13, and 14 of this Act: Provided, however, That if the agreement to arbitrate specifically provides that the question of the arbitrator's jurisdiction shall be subject to prior judicial determination, such provision shall be controlling. The participation by a party in an arbitration proceeding subject to this Act shall not be deemed a waiver of any claim of lack of jurisdiction or authority of the arbitrator if such claim is made during the proceeding and is not thereafter expressly waived.

(NOTE.—The foregoing preserves the substance of section 4 of the second draft. The only change of substance is the recognition of "General Electric" type contract provisions expressly providing for judicial determination of the arbitrability of a claim, prior to the arbitration hearing if a party claims lack of arbitrability. Otherwise, the basic intent is to establish that the arbitrator has jurisdiction to determine, in the first instance, any question of "arbitrability" which may be raised, subject, of course, to judicial review as provided later in the Act.)

SEC. 5. PROCEEDINGS TO COMPEL OR STAY ARBITRATION.—(a) If a party fails or refuses to proceed to arbitration under an agreement to arbitrate, the other party may apply to the appropriate district court for an order directing the parties to proceed with arbitration. The court, except as provided in subsection (e) of this section, shall order arbitration unless the opposing party denies the existence or validity of an agreement to arbitrate, or denies his failure to comply therewith. If either such issue is raised, the court shall take proof and determine the issue in summary proceedings. Upon finding that there is no valid agreement to arbitrate, or that there is no default thereunder, the proceedings shall be dismissed. Upon finding that a valid agreement to arbitrate exists, and that a party has failed or refused to proceed thereunder, the court shall direct the parties to proceed with arbitration in accordance with the agreement to arbitrate.

(b) A party against whom an arbitration proceeding has been commenced or threatened, and who denies the existence or validity of an agreement to arbitrate, may apply to the appropriate district court for an order staying an arbitration commenced or threatened. If the opposing party asserts the existence or validity of an agreement to arbitrate, the court shall take proof and determine the issue in summary proceedings. Upon finding that a valid agreement to arbitrate does not exist, the court shall enter an order staying the arbitration. Upon finding that a valid agreement to arbitrate does exist, the court shall, except as provided in subsection (e) of this section, direct the parties to proceed with arbitration in accordance with the agreement to arbitrate.

(c) An action or proceeding in any court involving an issue subject to arbitration under an agreement to arbitrate shall be stayed, except as provided in subsection (e) of this section, if an order for arbitration or an application therefor has been made under subsection (a) of this section, or if an application for a stay of arbitration has been made under subsection (b) of this section. If the issue is severable, the stay of such action or proceeding may be with respect to the severable issue only. Such stay shall remain in effect until the application for arbitration, or for the stay of arbitration, is disposed of, and shall become permanent if the application to proceed to arbitration is granted or the application to stay arbitration is denied.

(d) The court shall not have power to stay arbitration, or to refuse to order arbitration, if a valid agreement to arbitrate exists. If such agreement exists, but a party raises a question concerning the jurisdiction of the arbitrator under the agreement to arbitrate, the court shall not decide the issue, but shall, except as provided in subsection (e) of this section, refer the question to be decided by the arbitrator in the first instance subject to review as provided in Sections 13 and 14 of this Act.

(e) If the agreement to arbitrate provides expressly for a judicial determination, prior to the arbitration hearing, of a question raised concerning the arbitrability of the claim or claims made by the party demanding arbitration, the court shall, upon application of a party raising such question, take proof and determine the issue in summary proceedings. Upon finding that any such claim is arbitrable, the court shall direct the parties to proceed with the arbitration of such claim in accordance with the agreement to arbitrate. Upon finding that any such claim is not arbitrable, the court shall enter an order staying the arbitration of such claim.

(NOTE.—Section 5 incorporates these principles: (1) That, except where the arbitration agreement provides expressly for judicial determination of an issue of arbitrability prior to the arbitration hearing, the role of the court in prearbitration proceedings should be confined to the determination of the existence and validity of the underlying arbitration agreement, or the question of default thereunder; (2) that summary proceedings should be available both to compel and stay arbitration and to determine any question of arbitrability where the contract provides for judicial determination thereof prior to the arbitration hearing; and (3) that if a valid agreement to arbitrate exists, and a party is in default thereunder, the court should remand any question of arbitrability to the arbitrator for decision in the first instance (unless the contract expressly provides otherwise) subject to the standards of judicial review set forth later in the statute.

(The section thus rejects the premise of the Uniform Act that courts should have prearbitral jurisdiction not only to determine the existence of an agreement to arbitrate, and the question of default thereunder, but also, subject to the criterion of bona fides, to determine a claim of nonarbitrability. A majority of the committee believes that it is preferable, for the purpose of giving proper scope to the arbitration process, to permit the arbitrator himself to make the initial determination of issues of arbitrability (except where the contract expressly provides otherwise) so that, if judicial review follows at a later stage, the reviewing court will have the benefit of the arbitrator's reasoning on any such issue.

(Section 5(e) in the second draft provided jurisdiction in the district courts to stay State court proceedings under certain circumstances. It was decided to transfer this provision to a later point in the statute and to deal with the subject of State court jurisdiction somewhat more broadly. The new subsection (e) deals with the case where the agreement to arbitrate provides expressly for judicial determination, prior to the arbitration hearing, of questions of arbitrability.)

SEC. 6. APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATORS.—If the agreement to arbitrate provides a method of appointment of arbitrators, this method shall be followed. In the absence of such provision, or if the agreed method fails or for any reason cannot be followed, or when an arbitrator appointed fails or is unable to act and his successor has not been duly and promptly appointed, the appropriate district court on application of a party shall appoint a sole arbitrator to hear and determine the controversy. In making such appointment the court shall obtain from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service a list of nine (9) persons from the panel of arbitrators of the Service and shall make the appointment of the arbitrator from such list. An arbitrator so appointed shall proceed to hear and determine the controversy with all the powers he would have had if designated by the parties.

(NOTE.—This section departs from the substance of the Uniform Act only in requiring the court to make use of the FMCS in the appointment of a substitute arbitrator. Deleted from the second draft was the provision requiring the court to mail to the parties the FMCS list and the provision permitting each party to strike three names. In addition, the number of persons to be included on the list was raised from seven to nine.)

SEC. 7. MAJORITY ACTION BY ARBITRATORS.—The powers of the arbitrators, if there be more than one, may be exercised by a majority unless otherwise provided by the agreement to arbitrate or by this Act.

(NOTE.—This section omits the provision in the first draft concerning the contingency that an arbitrator may cease to act. The first draft provided that the remaining arbitrator or arbitrators, if appointed as neutrals, could continue with the case. Such provision seems unnecessary in view of the appointment provisions of section 6.)

SEC. 8. ARBITRATION PROCEDURE.—The arbitration shall be conducted in accordance with rules and procedures agreed upon by the parties or, in the absence of such agreement, by rules and procedures determined by the arbitrator. Such rules and procedures shall provide for a fair hearing.

(NOTE.—This section constitutes a radical departure from the corresponding section of the second draft. The change consists of the deletion of the specification of the details concerning hearing procedure, and the substitution of a simple provision leaving it to the parties or the arbitrator to prescribe rules of procedure subject only to the statutory requirement that the hearing be "fair".

(This change was decided upon by the subcommittee for several reasons. For one thing, section 8 of the second draft made the procedural standards set forth in subsection (b) subject to an agreement of the parties on procedure. Thus, they were not mandatory in any case, and it seemed, upon reflection, pointless to specify them. (The obvious reason for not making them mandatory in all cases is that the arbitration process should remain flexible in the matter of procedures, as it now is.) Moreover, it was felt that the specification of some of these procedural requirements would tend to invite litigation directed solely to the alleged failure to meet the statutory requirements. Finally, it was recognized that procedural standards are being evolved by the FMCS, AAA, and the NAA, and that these will probably provide sufficient guidance so that precatory provisions in the statute are unnecessary.)

(NOTE.—A majority of the committee members who have submitted comments favor omitting altogether this section of the first draft. This constitutes a departure from the Uniform Act, which would grant subpena power to the arbitrator and provide for witness fees. The power of subpena is really unnecessary, as experience shows, and to introduce it would be to invite irritating difficulties in the form of an attempt by parties to involve unwilling or adverse persons as witnesses, or to harass an opponent by "fishing" for documents. Any provision for witness fees is likewise inappropriate for labor dispute arbitrations.)

SEC. 9. AWARD.—(a) The award shall be in writing and signed by the arbitrator. The arbitrator shall cause a signed copy to be delivered to each party personally or by registered or certified mail or as provided by agreement of the parties.

(b) An award shall be made within the time fixed therefor in the agreement to arbitrate or at the hearing, or, if not so fixed, within a reasonable time. A party waives the objection that an award was not timely made unless he notifies the arbitrator and the other party of his objection prior to the delivery of the award.

(NOTE.—Subsection (b) deletes from the comparable provision in the second draft the specification that the award shall be filed within thirty days following the closing of the hearing where the parties have not fixed some other time. The provision that the parties may extend the time is likewise deleted. The 30-day provision, upon further reflection, was thought to be too rigid, and it seems unnecessary to provide in the statute that the parties may stipulate for an extension of time.)

SEC. 10. CHANGE OF AWARD BY ARBITRATOR.—On application of a party or, if an application to the district court is pending under sections 12, 13, or 14, on submission to the arbitrator by the court under such conditions as the court may order, the arbitrator may modify or correct the award where:

(1) There was an evident miscalculation of figures or an evident mistake in the description of any person, thing or property referred to in the award;

(2) The award is imperfect in a matter of form, not affecting the merits of the controversy; or

(3) For the purpose of clarifying the award.

The application shall be made within twenty (20) days after delivery of the award to the applicant. Written notice thereof shall be given forthwith to the opposing party, stating he must serve his objections thereto, if any, within ten (10) days from the notice. The award so modified or corrected is subject to the provisions of sections 12, 13, and 14 of this Act.

(NOTE.—This section conforms in substance with the corresponding section of the Uniform Act.)

SEC. 11. FEES AND EXPENSES OF ARBITRATION.—Unless otherwise provided by agreement of the parties, the arbitrator's expenses and fee shall be divided equally between the parties.

(NOTE.—This section differs from the corresponding section in the second draft in two respects, viz: (1) The words "or by this Act" appearing in the second draft, page 16, line 18, are omitted in view of the fact that the present draft omits any provision with respect to transcripts and the apportionment of the cost thereof; (2) the words "together with other expenses, not including counsel fees", appearing at page 17, lines 1 and 2, of the second draft, are omitted on the ground that they simply introduced a needless ambiguity.)

SEC. 12. CONFIRMATION OF THE AWARD.—Upon application of a party, the district court of the district in which the arbitration was held shall confirm an award unless within the time limits hereinafter imposed grounds are urged for vacating or modifying or correcting the award, in which case the court shall proceed as provided in sections 13 and 14.

SEC. 13. VACATING AN AWARD.—(a) Upon application of a party, the district court of the district in which the arbitration was held shall vacate the award:

(1) Where the award was procured by corruption, fraud, or other undue means;

(2) Where there was no agreement to arbitrate and the party claiming the absence of such agreement made such claim in the arbitration proceeding and did not expressly waive it thereafter;

(3) To the extent that the award is affected by the arbitrator's determination of an issue which he had no jurisdiction to determine, and the parties have not expressly agreed to be bound by the arbitrator's determination of his jurisdiction. The award shall not be vacated if there was a reasonable basis for the arbitrator's determination, express or implicit, of his jurisdiction. The fact that the award orders relief of a kind which might not be granted by a court of law or equity is not ground for vacating the award;

(4) To the extent that the award directs a party to commit an act or engage in conduct prohibited by State or Federal law;

(5) Where the arbitrator so conducted the hearing, contrary to provisions of Section 8, as to prejudice substantially the rights of a party.

(b) An application under this section shall be made within thirty (30) days after delivery of a copy of the award to the applicant, except that, if predicated upon corruption, fraud or other undue means, it shall be made within thirty (30) days after such grounds are known or should have been known.

(c) In vacating the award on grounds other than stated in clause (2) of subsection (a) the court may order a rehearing before another arbitrator chosen as provided in the agreement to arbitrate, or in the absence of such provision, by the court in accordance with section 6 of this Act, or, if the award is vacated on grounds set forth in clauses (3) and (5) of subsection (a), the court may order a rehearing before the arbitrator who made the award or his successor appointed in accordance with section 6. The time within which the agreement to arbitrate requires the award to be made is applicable to the rehearing and commences from the date of the rehearing or from such date as is determined by the court.

(d) If the application to vacate is denied and no motion to modify or correct the award is pending, the court shall confirm the award.

(NOTE.—This section incorporates two changes of substance from the comparable section of the second draft.

(In subsection (a)(2) the language appearing in the second draft at page 17, lines 18 and 19, was omitted as being unnecessary. It is believed that, if a court has determined, in a proceeding under section 5, that there was an agreement to arbitrate, such determination would be res judicata.

(Subsection (a)(3) has been completely recast. It was thought that this subsection of the second draft, although intended to deal primarily with the review of issues of arbitrability, actually would permit a review, subject to the stated limitations, of error in the interpretation of the collective agreement. It was thought that this problem might be met by restating the basis for review in such a way as to omit any reference to "excess of powers", and substitute what is in clause (3) of the present draft. Thus recast, the only basis for review under this clause is that the arbitrator determined an issue which he had no jurisdiction to determine.)

SEC. 14. MODIFICATION OR CORRECTION OF AWARD.—(a) Upon application made within thirty (30) days after delivery of a copy of the award to the applicant, the district court of the district in which the hearing was held shall modify or correct the award where:

(1) There was an evident miscalculation of figures or an evident mistake in the description of any person, thing, or property referrred to in the award.

(2) The award is imperfect in a matter of form, not affecting the merits of the controversy.

(b) If the application is granted, the district court shall modify and correct the award so as to effect its intent and shall confirm the award as so modified and corrected. Otherwise, the district court shall confirm the award as made.

(c) An application to modify or correct an award may be joined in the alternative with an application to vacate the award.

(NOTE.—This section differs from the corresponding section of the second draft only in the deletion of subsection (a)(2) of that draft. This deletion was thought desirable since section 13 deals adequately with the subject matter.)

SEC. 15. JUDGMENT OR DECREE ON AWARD.—Upon the granting of an order confirming, modifying or correcting an award, judgment, or decree shall be entered in conformity therewith and be enforced and docketed as any other judgment or decree. Costs of the application and of the proceedings subsequent thereto, and disbursements may be awarded by the court.

SEC. 16. APPLICATIONS TO COURT.—Except as otherwise provided, an application to the appropriate district court under this Act shall be by motion and shall be heard in the manner and upon the notice provided by law or rule of court for the making and hearing of motions. Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, notice of an initial application for an order shall be served in the manner provided by law for the service of a summons in an action: Provided, That the process of the district court shall extend to and be valid when served in any judicial district.

SEC. 17. VENUE.—Except as otherwise provided herein, an initial application shall be made to the district court of the district in which under the agreement to arbitrate, the arbitration hearing shall be held. If the agreement to arbitrate makes no provision for the place of hearing, such application shall be made to the district court of the district in which the dispute arose, or in the event that the dispute arose in more than one district the application shall be made to the district court for the district in which is located the employer's principal place of business. All subsequent applications shall be made to the court hearing the initial application unless the court otherwise directs.

SEC. 18. STATE COURT JURISDICTION.—(a) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to preclude the assumption by a State court of jurisdiction with respect to an agreement to arbitrate provided its action is consistent with the provisions of this Act;

(b) The appropriate district court may, upon application of a party to an agreement to arbitrate, stay the prosecution of a State court proceeding to stay arbitration or to set aside an arbitration award in any case in which State court action is sought upon a ground which would not be a proper ground for the requested relief under this Act;

(c) A proceeding in a State court to compel or stay arbitration, or to set aside or enforce an arbitration award, in which an alleged agreement to arbitrate is the basis for or involved in the proceeding, may be removed to an appropriate district court, without regard to the citizenship or residence of the parties, in the manner provided by law.

(NOTE.—In the second draft, section 5(e) gave the Federal courts jurisdiction to stay proceedings in State courts, "involving issues the decision of which may subvert the purposes and policies of this act." It was considered desirable to deal with the subject of State court jurisdiction somewhat more comprehensively, and in a separate section. The intended effect of section 18 is to insure, if a party so desires, that State court jurisdiction shall not be assumed to accomplish an objective which could not be accomplished under the Federal act.)

SEC. 19. APPEALS.—(a) An appeal may be taken from:

(1) An order denying an application to compel arbitration made under section 5;

(2) An order granting an application to stay arbitration made under section 5;

(3) An order confirming or denying confirmation of an award;

(4) An order modifying or correcting an award;

(5) An order vacating an award without directing a rehearing;

(6) A judgment or decree entered pursuant to the provisions of this Act; or

(7) An order made under section 18 staying the prosecution of a State court proceeding.

(b) The appeal shall be taken in the manner and to the same extent as from orders or judgments in a civil action.

(NOTE.—This section includes what was in section 18 of the second draft, and adds only clause (7) to subsection (a).)

SEC. 20. CONSTITUTIONALITY.—If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the invalidity shall not affect other provisions or applications of the Act which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this Act are severable.

SEC. 21. REPEAL.—All Acts or parts of Acts which are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 22. TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.—This Act shall take effect ———.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, some time in the distant past, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare established what we called a "blue ribbon" panel of experts to study and recommend possible changes in the Taft-Hartley Act. After the denouement of last September, the work of this panel is apparently a dead letter.

However, I am ever hopeful that reason can be brought to prevail in labor-management legislation. At such time as it does, I would hope that this matter of arbitration would also be considered, and the desirability of legislation along these lines examined carefully.

WELCOME TO WYOMING

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, the hour is late, and I do not wish to be guilty of making it later, for I know many Senators are anxious to begin preparations for the remainder of the Fourth of July weekend.

However, the great amount of talk we have heard in this Chamber the past few days about the forthcoming trip of the Democratic Party to Los Angeles for the national convention prompts me to call attention to the fact that many of the roads and airlanes leading westward cross our beautiful State of Wyoming.

Therefore, I would like, in this 11th hour of the split session, to assure all my colleagues, their aides, delegates, indeed everyone from these easterly shores, that a wonderful Wyoming welcome will be awaiting all who have the opportunity to pass through our State en route to the convention.

So wonderful are the summers in Wyoming, where we do not have to contend with temperature-humidity indexes and other measurements of discomfort, that I dare say anyone who makes it a point to visit Wyoming may find themselves hard put to find the will to continue further westward.

Mr. President, I know the next 2 weeks will be extremely busy and hectic for anyone connected with the body politic. But I suggest to these friends, who will undoubtedly find their nervous systems in a state of disarray next week, that there is no finer relaxing tonic in the world than a visit, however brief, to the scenic, cool, cowboy State of Wyoming.

ABOLITION OF LADD FIELD, AMERICA'S NORTHERNMOST AIR FORCE BASE: A TRAGIC ERROR

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, earlier in the day there was a colloquy between the able and distinguished junior Senator from Missouri and the able and distinguished junior Senator from Arizona on certain aspects of our defense, particularly in relation to aircraft. Both these colleagues are experienced, indeed experts, in this field. Yet apparently they differ substantially on certain aspects of the issue which has come before the Senate and the people generally on many occasions and will doubtless come again. The issue is whether the United States has provided adequately for its defense. People—and, no less, experts—may differ honestly, but it is natural to expect a certain inclination during this campaign year for speakers on this issue, as on other issues, to array themselves either for or against what this administration is doing or not doing. I do not desire to enter into this controversy because it is a highly complex, technical question and depends on many factors with which very few people are fully acquainted. It is clear, however, that in recent months a number of highly qualified experts, men of known integrity and dedication, including two former Chiefs of Staff, who are in a position to know, have voluntarily resigned from their high posts and retired to private life in protest against what they considered the inadequate defense policies of this administration. We need only list the names of Gen. Matthew Ridgway, Gen. Maxwell Taylor, Lieutenant General Gavin and others, not to mention the Gaither report, to show that there is very substantial ground for apprehension that our defense policies are not adequate. But I wish to address myself to one specific item in the defense picture which concerns me very much and I think should concern the Nation, and to present the facts for what they are worth.

Twenty-five years ago, that great soldier, William (Billy) Mitchell, who had been a voice in the wilderness crying for the need of airpower for the Nation's safety, and who sacrificed his military career to his dedication to what he believed to be the truth, spoke also on the subject of Alaska.

I think it is scarcely necessary to point out that Billy Mitchell's wisdom at that time concerning the importance of airpower in war was amply justified and so proved not long after his retirement from the Army and his untimely death.

When he made his forthright and prophetic pleas for attention to the airplane as an instrument of warfare, he was bitterly opposed by the high command in both the Army and Navy, and as we all know, he was court-martialed and cashiered for his vision, his courage and his independence. In his last public appearance, in 1935, testifying before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, he called attention to the great strategic importance of Alaska, saying of our political enemy at that time, which was Japan:

They will come right here to Alaska.

And adding:

Alaska is the most central place in the world for aircraft, and that is true either of Europe, Asia, or North America. I believe in the future he who holds Alaska will hold the world and I think it is the most important strategic place in the world.

For several years thereafter, this sound counsel of Billy Mitchell's was as ignored as were his recommendations about airpower. But a few years later, with the war clouds looming up on the horizon, the Federal authorities, military and civil, who had charge of our national defenses, belatedly began to appreciate the importance of Alaska to our Nation's defense. They were, of course, too late, and as a result, Alaska was the only part of this continent that was invaded and for a time held by the Japanese enemy. It required the costly Aleutian campaign to expel him.

Subsequently, but with great effort, mostly stimulated by Alaskans, Alaskan defenses were built up. But they were always far from what they should have been.

Another great soldier, Henry Harley Arnold, known as "Hap" Arnold, who became the first Chief of Staff of the newly constituted Air Force as an independent branch of our armed services, who became the one and only 5-star general of the Air Force, and whose whole career in the Army paralleled the rise of the airplane, was no less concerned about the importance of Alaska and the lack of appreciation thereof by others in high places. Several years after the close of World War II, in which the Air Force played so important a part in securing victory, he wrote, in his book, "Global Mission:"

Through to this day Alaska has never received the attention in national defense planning that it deserves.

Alaska had always been and no matter what happened in any theater of war, always remained, to me privately, a high priority. But we were never able to get the money or allocations for the Air Force that we really needed there to give us the kind of bases we required then—and need more than ever now.

Gradually, however, this situation was rectified. Fort Richardson, an Army base, and Elmendorf Field, an Air Force base, were established at Anchorage, and Ladd Field, which had been begun in 1938 as a cold weather testing station, was converted into our northernmost Air Force base. During the last decade every Chief of Staff in every administration has adhered to a consistent pattern in building up the defense of Alaska along what is known as the "heartland concept," by which the first line of defense was placed more or less from north to south, midway across Alaska, for the purpose of allowing the maximum amount of time for a warning to be given of an aggressor. The northern bastion of this line was Ladd Field. A few miles in back of it was another air base, Eielson. South of these at Anchorage was Elmendorf Field, and slightly southwest out in the Gulf of Alaska the naval base at Kodiak. In addition, a joint Army, Navy and Air Force base which had been created incidental to the expulsion of the Japanese enemy from the Aleutians was established at Adak.

Even so, it has been clear that these defenses were minimal, as the theater commanders in each case knew, and on occasion stated. And a year ago, Lt. Gen. Frank Armstrong, the Alaska commander in chief, Alaska being an Air Force command, called attention to the lack of missile sites and other inadequacies. No heed, however, was paid to him.

Some 3 months ago, however, the Alaska congressional delegation and Gov. William Egan were notified that these defenses would be strengthened by the replacement at Ladd Field of the 449th Interceptor Squadron, consisting of F–89 planes, by F–101 planes. These were more modern and faster planes. But 4 weeks later, this program was changed and we were notified that instead this interceptor squadron would be wiped out.

Although my colleague, Senator BARTLETT, and I were vouchsafed a briefing in the Pentagon to indicate to us that this meant no actual dimunition in our defensive strength, we were totally unable to follow the logic by which subtraction is anything else but diminution. At that time, nothing was said about any further diminution. However, a few days ago, we were notified that all of Ladd Field would be totally abolished.

A letter from Gen. Thomas C. Musgrave, Jr., Director of Legislative Liaison of the Air Force, transmitted this news in a letter dated June 29, which indicated that there would be an immediate reduction in Ladd Field of 1,600 military and 430 civilians, to be followed 6 months hence by a further reduction of 1,570 military and 325 civilians. These add up to 3,170 military and 755 civilians, or a total of 3,925—in round figures, 4,000 men. On the other hand, we are told that there will be an increase of 350 military and 100 civilians in Elmendorf, and 400 military and 200 civilians at Eielson. These additions total 1,050. Subtracting these from the previous figure, we still have a reduction in Alaska, as a whole, of 2,875 men, mostly military, or nearly 3,000 men.

Mr. President, I cannot conceive of any justification for this reduction, and I intend to make known crystal clear my view, and that of my colleague, Senator BARTLETT, along with that of our colleague in the House, Representative RALPH RIVERS, and that of the Governor of Alaska, William Egan, and of Alaskans generally, that quite apart from the seriousness of this blow to Alaska, it is a shocking weakening of our national defense.

As a result of the summit fiasco following the U–2 incident, the events in Japan, the dissatisfaction voiced among numerous nations whom we have considered in our camp, and where we have been committed at great cost to establish bases ringing Russia, it would be folly not to assume that our military position has been potentially greatly weakened throughout the world. We certainly do not know how long we may be able to retain some of these foreign bases. We know that even prior to the U–2 episode, there was dissatisfaction and unrest in some of the countries where we had established bases. We were told to get out of Morocco, where we had spent hundreds of millions of dollars establishing air bases. We were not wanted in Iceland, and had, in effect, to bribe the Icelanders, by commercial means, to permit the retention of our bases there. We know that in Spain we are being forced to pay through the nose for the privilege of retaining our very costly bases, on which we have spent over a billion dollars and feel obligated to spend more millions annually to keep dictator Franco in line. Recently, the President of Pakistan expressed great doubt about our ability to act in the event of trouble. I need not enlarge this picture, although I could, to point out that all of our bases in foreign lands are now on much shakier ground than they were before, although I have long believed, and have said so publicly, that I thought that most of these foreign bases were built on quicksand, figuratively speaking.

Now the object of these foreign bases were obviously to circle Russia—to have jumping-off places near Russia from which we could dispatch bombers in case of trouble.

What, then, is the logic or the justification for eliminating the one base which is the northernmost under the American flag, and the one base nearest Russian territory, but which, unlike all these other bases in foreign lands, is built not on shifting sands, shifting at the whims of dictators, or under threats of attack from Russia, but built in Alaska on the solid rock of American soil, surrounded by a militantly patriotic, 100-percent American citizenry?

We know, incidentally, that across the Bering Sea, in eastern Siberia, airfields with great runways have been constructed and that the Russians have greatly increased the defensive and offensive strength of that area.

I denounce the abandonment of Ladd Field as colossal folly and as a tragic blunder. The mere fact that the Air Force could change its position twice so drastically in the period of a few weeks and be unable to give any adequate justification for it, calls attention to the enormity of what I believe to be a serious error.

In attempting justification of this move, we were given various explanations. We were told that budgetary considerations played a part, and I have no doubt that that is so. The budget is supreme in this administration. We were told that in the event of attack on Alaska, planes from the mainland would rush to our rescue. We were told that in the event of a shooting war, the Russians would not waste their time attacking Alaska. None of these explanations, individually or collectively, make any sense. If it is sound policy for us to build and maintain foreign bases throughout the world, it certainly is unsound to remove our northernmost and westernmost airbase on American soil and the base which above all others is closest to the military establishments of our most obvious potential enemy.

While, as I stated earlier, I do not presume to enter into a discussion of the relative strengths of our Nation and the totalitarian powers in Eurasia, whether we are behind or ahead in this or that type of missile or plane, I do know that this particular retreat—the total elimination of Ladd Field—is strongly indicative that the powers who direct our overall defense are sadly misguided.

Two years ago, when we were seeking statehood, the White House—that is, President Eisenhower—insisted that as a condition to his approval of the entry of Alaska as a State, virtually the entire northern half of Alaska—an area of 225,000 square miles, an area larger than the State of California—would have to be set aside, or at least designated, as an area which the President could, in case of emergency, withdraw wholly or in part for defense purposes. We Alaskans saw no justification for that, since the President could, in any event, make such withdrawals. Moreover, the constitutionality of such a provision in the Statehood Act, into which it was written, was challenged on the floor, and, I believe, with considerable validity. Nevertheless, all concerned yielded in view of the pressing nature of the demand and the insistence upon it by the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces. This was a unique and unprecedented development in the history of our Nation, and dramatically signified this administration's view of the great strategic and military importance of Alaska to the entire North American continent.

How, then, can we justify what is essentially a complete reversal of policy, even making due allowance for certain changes in the implements of war, the advent of missiles, etc., nothing could justify so complete a volt-vace as this.

Certainly in this period of great uncertainty and change, with an alarming decline of influence and prestige of the United States in the world, and augmenting rumblings of discontent among friendly nations, this is not the time to make such a change. My colleague, Senator BARTLETT, and I have wired the President and asked him to review this situation. We have received no reply. When the 449th Squadron's removal from Ladd Field was announced 2 months ago, we were promised a complete review by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Instead, we merely got the news of the total abolition of Ladd Field and the substantial diminution of the entire military strength of Alaska.

Alaska's defenses, never adequate, are now, in this hour of greatest world crisis and greatest national peril, being further drastically reduced.

I denounce it as folly, and hope that if that decision is not promptly reversed or held in abeyance, that the next administration will have the wisdom and intelligence to do so.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. Earlier today, unanimous consent was requested and obtained by the Senator from Indiana and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania for permission to address the Senate following the completion of action on a certain measure. We have been on our feet since that time, continuously, seeking recognition. My parliamentary inquiry is whether any value remains in the unanimous-consent agreement we obtained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That inquiry would seem a proper one to make of the majority leader.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me ask the majority leader whether we shall be able to proceed following the disposition of the legislative business represented by the papers the Senator from Texas now holds in his hand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Of course, I had no knowledge that any Senator had requested that he be recognized at a certain time or that such an agreement had been entered into, until I was informed of it a moment ago by the respective Senators.

We have a number of conference reports and other measures on which the Senate must vote; and I have been asking Senators to remain here and participate in the votes.

If Senators wish to speak until midnight, they may do so.

After they speak, I hope the Senate will proceed to take final action on Calendar No. 290.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 290, the equal rights for men and women joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title, for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 69) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the equal rights for men and women.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

U.S. PARTICIPATION IN RESETTLEMENT OF CERTAIN REFUGEES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may yield for not to exceed 10 minutes to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], in connection with the conference report on the refugee bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 397) to enable the United States to participate in the resettlement of certain refugees, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read, for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report. (For conference report, see House proceedings of today.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Are we now proceeding under the provisions of a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I asked unanimous consent that it be in order to call up this conference report and that the Senator from Illinois be permitted to proceed for not to exceed for 10 minutes in connection with the conference report on the refugee bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that I have no objection to having the report called up and to having it debated. But I do object to parceling out the time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this matter should not take very long.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, did the Chair put the question in connection with my request?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I object to having the time parceled out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let me explain that we are confronted with a problem, for two Senators obtained unanimous consent to address the Senate, and we wish to accommodate them, and do not wish to require them to wait here for the rest of the evening in order to be able to address the Senate. We have had to ask them to wait much longer than was anticipated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the only disagreement with respect to the refugee joint resolution was rather freely expressed last night. It was over the amendment submitted by the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG], providing for the admission of 4,500 refugees for a period of 2 years, under United Nations mandate.

That was the one item in controversy in the conference. We discussed the matter at length.

The situation in the conference was simply this: The House conferees said, "We will not accept it. It is a departure from the approach to this matter, because the four House bills which are consolidated in this joint resolution dealt essentially with the European refugee problem, in order to get the refugee camps in Europe closed and finally to get out of this business."

So the measure dealt with essentially a similar group of persons, but in Europe only.

The House committee members will be going to the Orient this year; and it is anticipated that when they return they will be willing to go as far as the Senator from Hawaii had in mind, if not further.

That is the situation.

But as to this joint resolution, the House conferees said they would not accept an amendment providing for the admission from other areas of even as many as one refugee.

After a full and complete conference, that was still their position.

As I said last night—when I said I would assert the position taken by the Senate—I did assert, in the conference, the position of the Senate. The House conferees said, "If that is the case, there will be no bill."

Mr. President, this is World Refugee Year, and we are deeply interested in having this measure enacted into law, for it contains provisions which relate not only to orphans and to the Dutch and to the Portuguese, but also to narcotics and to the admission into the United States of our share of the European refugees, in the proportion of receiving one in the United States for every three received by European countries—in short, we will take one-fourth.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, we knew this last night; we knew it earlier today; and we know it now. We were handed the joint resolution with the understanding that if any change in it were made, the joint resolution would not be enacted into law. We agreed to accept it—aside from the very happy interruption, last night, by the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG], who electrified the Senate with the virtuosity of his demonstration of his great devotion to this most worthy cause.

Mr. President, this measure does not do, in this World Refugee Year, what should be done in order to have us take action in accord with the majesty and the dignity that the responsibilities of the United States dictate.

Mr. President, I promise the Senate that this will not happen again. We will fight to make the next immigration bill a really good immigration measure which will properly represent the interests of the United States.

Mr. President, we have been electrified by the virtuosity, the devotion, and the sincerity of the distinguished Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG]; and in him we have a great captain.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield 2 minutes to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I regret that the conferees have not seen fit to report the amendment which the Senate agreed to last night.

I am heartened, however, to learn that the House committee will go to the Far East and to the Middle East, to see what the problem is.

I have discussed this matter with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee; and he has advised me that the conferees of the House will go to the Far East to study the problem and to look into the screening used, and that upon their return they will implement their findings into a measure which will permit some of the refugees to come into the United States.

Mr. President, I will vote for this joint resolution because it contains some good features, as it will allow some refugees and some orphans from Europe to enter the United States and because when I meet a man from the Far East or when I meet a man from the Middle East, I can look him in the eye and can say to him that this great deliberative body, the Senate of the United States, has in its wisdom and in its great humanitarianism and in its sense of justice and fairplay adopted my amendment to this measure.

I hope that at the next session we shall have a measure which will do justice and will provide fairness to the people of the Far East. Mr. President, I wish to state that I hope that either the House Committee or the Senate Committee on the Judiciary will take action which will result in bringing to the floor of this body such a measure. I now give warning that if such a measure does not come to this floor next session in ample time before adjournment, I will find a bill before the Senate, and I will attach such an amendment to it.

I wish to thank the Members of the Senate for helping me adopt this amendment. I know the refugees in the Far East and Middle East will be thankful to them for recognizing the problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the report has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this situation was somewhat like the situation in biblical times, if I may be pardoned for saying so, when Abraham was pleading for Sodom and Gomorrah. He was told, "If you can just find 50 righteous people, 40 righteous people, 30 righteous people." I said, "Give us 1,000, give us 500"—as my distinguished friend said, "If you will put one in, to preserve the principle." I said, "All right. Give us one." The House conferees said, "No; we will not take any." So I pleaded our cause.

I share the Senator's delight that they will go to Hong Kong and other places in the Orient and make a good, searching scrutiny. I share the Senator's hope that there will be legislation that will go even further than what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And I hope, when they go, that they will point out, as the able Senator from Hawaii has, that the Senate last night, as a result of his speech, did adopt his amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. He did well.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have about 30 seconds.

Mr. SCOTT. If I can get the floor under any guise, I am glad to get it. I am in accord with what the Senator from Hawaii has said. A great injustice was done by the action of the conference. I personally pledge my efforts to help the Senator from Hawaii see that justice and right prevails in the next session, when the bill will come before this body and the other body, in some form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, is Calendar No. 290, Senate Joint Resolution 69, the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 69) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the equal rights for men and women.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has an amendment. He needs to be at a conference very shortly. He says he will take only 5 minutes. If he can offer his amendment, I will then yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE].

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to recognition before the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, with regard to the joint resolution now under consideration, I call up my amendment, which has been printed and is now at the desk, and ask to have the clerk read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, after line 2, to insert the following:

> The provisions of this article shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits, or exemptions now or hereafter conferred by law upon persons of the female sex.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I may state that printed copies of my amendment are available, if any Senator would like to see it.

Mr. President, this amendment is identical with the one which I have offered twice before when the text now embodied in the pending joint resolution was under consideration. On January 25, 1950, my amendment was agreed to by a vote of 51 yeas to 31 nays, after which the so-called equal rights amendment was adopted by a vote of 63 yeas to 19 nays, 14 Senators not voting. On July 16, 1953, the amendment was again approved; this time by a vote of 58 yeas to 25 nays, with 13 Senators not voting. The equal rights amendment was then adopted by a vote of 73 yeas to 11 nays.

It is evident from these vote records that a change of a few yea votes to nay votes on final passage would have defeated the amendment. I am convinced these votes would have changed had I not submitted and secured adoption of my proposal in each of the two instances.

On previous occasions I have made the following statements:

The proposed amendment to the Constitution, as reported to the Senate, is based upon the fallacy that men and women are so much alike that they should, under all laws, be considered equals. The truth is that they are not alike to any such degree.

* * * * *

Knowing that men and women are inherently different, plain common sense tells me that the law can recognize that difference by granting rights and benefits and exemptions to women which need not necessarily be granted to men. And that is what is now done by the laws of every State in the Union. It is to preserve those laws, beneficial and protective to women, that I offer this amendment.

I believe that these statements are fully as applicable now as they were 7 and 10 years ago.

What I endeavor to do by proposing my amendment to the joint resolution is to be certain that no rights now enjoyed by women are lost by them. The joint resolution, although it uses the word "rights" does not define it. In fact, the wording of the resolution is so vague and confusing that no one can know precisely what it means.

Mr. President, I should like to read into the RECORD a letter written by the Acting Secretary of Labor, James T. O'Connell:

I understand that you have inquired concerning the position of the Department of Labor on the equal rights amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 69.

The Department of Labor strongly supports the principle of equal rights between men and women in employment, in civil rights and in other areas and we favor sound steps to eliminate any inequities. We do not believe, however, that any action should be taken which might endanger existing legislative protections of the employment conditions of women. We believe that Senate Joint Resolution 69 is drafted in such a manner that it is most uncertain as to what its effect would be. For this reason we do not recommend favorable action on the proposal.

In other words that is the position of the Department of Labor as to what will happen unless my amendment shall be adopted.

It is my opinion that adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment without my clarifying wording would result in an infinite number of lawsuits and in endless litigation. Before court interpretation could clarify the intent and meaning of the joint resolution, many years would elapse during which it is not only possible, but probable, that rights, benefits, and privileges now enjoyed by women throughout the United States would be denied to them.

A report made in June 1958 by the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Department of Labor indicates that women engage in all professions, are employed in all occupational classifications and are participating in all phases of governmental activity and community life. It is clear from the report that many changes have taken place in the status of women in the United States, as is evidenced by the volume of legislation enacted in recent sessions of State legislatures, and, therefore, today, the proposal and the arguments in support of the amendment are no longer valid. The difficulty with this issue is that the proponents of the amendment have been proceeding on the premise that nothing has happened within the more than 30 years since the amendment was initially proposed.

My opposition is fundamental and deals with matters that are basic to our social structure. The chief conflict between those who support the amendment and those who oppose it is the question of what constitutes discrimination against women. Those who want equal opportunities and responsibilities and equal status for women know that it is frequently necessary to obtain real equality through a difference in treatment rather than an identity in treatment. They also believe that orderly legislative revision by means of specific bills for specific ills is the practical way to erase such unwise discriminations as still exist in the laws. The Women's Bureau report covers a period of 20 years and clearly demonstrates the wisdom of this approach. For instance, take the matter of jury service: On January 1, 1938, 25 States barred women from serving on State and Federal juries. However, on January 1, 1958, women were eligible for jury service in all States and only three States bar them from service on State juries.

Another dramatic advance in the legal status of women is the change in the laws related to married women's eligibility for service in fiduciary capacities. On January 1, 1938, 32 States barred married women's service as an executor or administrator of an estate, guardian, or trustee. By January 1, 1958, only 10 States still had minor restrictions on a married woman's service in a fiduciary capacity.

The support for the amendment has not always been based on careful analysis or scientific investigation. The opponents, on the other hand, have attempted to gather current data to support their point of view. For example, an investigation made by the American Nurses' Association several years ago points out some of the fallacies of the argument of the sponsors. The study concluded that the need for special protections for women is increasing rather than decreasing.

I am firmly convinced that the adoption of the amendment would create endless and useless confusion in the wide field of laws relating to property, personal status, and marriage; that it is unnecessary because most of the inequalities of which its advocates complain are due to custom and tradition, not to law, and are disappearing in the natural course of social progress; and that the adoption of the amendment would nullify our special labor laws for the protection of women, at a time when such legislation is more necessary than ever before, due to the rapid increase in the number and proportion of women in the country's labor force.

For these reasons, many national organizations continue to oppose this amendment. Included in this list of opponents are such organizations as the National Consumers League, the National Council of Jewish Women, the American Nurses' Association, the National Council of Catholic Women, and member unions of the AFL–CIO.

Many lawyers and legal scholars view the amendment as a highly inept method of improving the legal status of women.

This view was most forcefully expressed by Prof. Paul Freund of the Harvard Law School when he stated that:

The basic fallacy in the proposed amendment is that it attempts to deal with complicated and highly concrete problems arising out of a diversity of human relationships in terms of a single and simple abstraction. This abstraction is undoubtedly a worthy ideal for mobilizing legislative forces in order to remedy particular deficiencies in the law. But as a constitutional standard, it is hopelessly inept. That the proposed equal rights amendment would open up an era of regrettable consequences for the legal status of women in this country is highly probable. That it would open up a period of extreme confusion in constitutional law is a certainty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Women's Bureau report to which I have referred be printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I also ask that there be printed a list of the officers of 24 national organizations who have joined in submitting a statement to the advance platform hearings of the Democratic National Committee held in Miami, Fla., on June 27, 1960, urging that support of the so-called equal rights amendment be omitted from the 1960 Democratic Party platform.

There being no objection, the report and list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPERTY AND POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN—JANUARY 1, 1938–JANUARY 1, 1958

Women's increased participation in the labor force and in government has focused nationwide attention on laws affecting their property and political rights. Today, women represent one-third of the total labor force, and about one-half of these 22½ million women are married. During some period of their adult life most women are wage earners. They engage in all professions, are managers and owners of businesses, and are employed in all occupational classifications. In addition to their own earnings, women control a substantial portion of the Nation's wealth. Whether in or out of the labor force, women are participating in all phases of governmental activity and community life.

The fact that State legislatures have taken cognizance of the importance of women's economic and political status is evidenced by the volume of legislation introduced and enacted in recent sessions. Areas of legislative action include, among others, women's eligibility for jury service, contractual rights of married women and guardianship of minor children.

This report is based on the Women's Bureau series 157, The Legal Status of Women. It indicates changes in law, by enactment or amendment, in the 20-year period from January 1, 1938 (the date of the original study) to January 1, 1958. The material covered is selective and does not include all the subjects summarized in the most recent report, Bulletin 157, "The Legal Status of Women. U.S. Summary, January 1, 1953."

I. POLITICAL RIGHTS

A. Jury service

January 1, 1938

Twenty-five States[1] barred women from service on State and Federal juries. In the remaining 23 States they were eligible for jury service.

January 1, 1958

Women are eligible for Federal jury service in all States. Three States[2] bar them from service on State juries.

B. Elective public office—Eligibility of women

January 1, 1938

Oklahoma, by constitutional provision, made women ineligible for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, secretary of state, auditor, attorney general, treasurer, superintendent of public instructions, and State examiner and inspector.

Women were fully eligible for elective public office in all other States.

January 1, 1958

Women are eligible for elective public office in all States.

II. CIVIL RIGHTS

A. Contractual rights of a married woman

1. Right to contract with respect to her separate real property:

January 1, 1938

Twenty-seven States[3] restricted a married woman's powers.

January 1, 1958

Four additional States[4] removed restrictions. A total of 26 States have no restrictions. Twenty-three States still have them.

2. Right to contract with respect to her separate personal property:

January 1, 1938

Six States[5] restricted a married woman's powers.

January 1, 1958

No State restricts a married woman's powers.

3. Contracts between husband and wife:

January 1, 1938

Thirty-three States[6] limited or did not permit contracts between husband and wife. Only two States—Connecticut and New York—permitted husband and wife to contract with each other regarding both real and personal property. Seven States[7] had no restrictions on personal property contracts; 11[8] had none with respect to real property.

January 1, 1958

In 19 States[9] husband and wife may contract freely with respect to both real and personal property. Fourteen States[10] limit such contracts. Massachusetts and Vermont prohibit contracts between husband and wife except partnership agreements. No statutory right of contracting exists in the remaining 11 States.[11]

4. Married women's eligibility for service in fiduciary capacities:

January 1, 1938

Thirty-two States[12] limited or barred married women's service as an executor or administrator of an estate, guardian or trustee. In 17 States a woman whether married or single had full capacity.

January 1, 1958

Ten States[13] have minor restrictions on a married woman's service in a fiduciary capacity.

B. Procedure required for a married woman to engage in a separate business

January 1, 1938

Six States[14] had so-called sole-trader statutes which required some formal procedure to empower a married woman to engage in business on her own account. Eight States[15] had statutes requiring a wife to place on public record a list of her separate personal property in order that her rights of ownership would be protected if the property were seized by her husband's creditors on the assumption that it is his property.

January 1, 1958

Five States[16] have sole-trade statutes requiring some formal procedure on part of a married woman who desires to engage in a separate business. Massachusetts requires that in order for a married woman to protect her business from her husband's creditors, she must record a "separate business certificate" in the town where the business is conducted. Five additional States[17] have statutes permitting a married woman to place on public record a list of her separate personal property, from whatever source derived in order that her rights of ownership may be protected from her husband's creditors.

C. Married woman's management and control of her own earnings

January 1, 1938

In all States except 7[18] of the 8 community-property States a married woman had the right to manage and control her own earnings.

January 1, 1958

All States but 6[19] of the community-property States, give married women the right to manage and control her own earnings.

D. Domicile of a married woman

January 1, 1938

In all States a married woman's domicile follows that of her husband. Separate domicile was allowed for:

Voting, seven States.[20]

Public office, five States.[21]

January 1, 1958

Married woman's domicile follows that of her husband in all States. Separate domicile is allowed for:

Voting, eighth States.[22]

Public office, four States.[23]

E. Family homestead

1. Exemption

January 1, 1938

Forty-two States[24] entitled the head of a family, that is, a person on whom others are dependent for support, to a homestead exemption from seizure for debt by creditors. Seven States[25] did not allow such an exemption.

January 1, 1958

With the addition of Arizona, 43 States provide a homestead exemption.

2. Conveyance

January 1, 1938

Of all the States allowing a homestead exemption, 21[26] required the signature of both husband and wife to make a valid deed, conveyance, or sale of the homestead.

January 1, 1958

The number requiring the signature of both husband and wife to make a valid conveyance of the homestead has been increased

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I rise to speak, very briefly, in opposition to the joint resolution, even as amended.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution appears to be something good upon its face, but if it were to be approved by the Congress and ratified by a sufficient number of States it would introduce confusion in virtually all of the laws of the States as well as the laws of the United States.

We have on the statute books a Federal act which provides for the drafting of men to serve in the Armed Forces of the Nation and participate in combat in those Armed Forces. If the proposed constitutional amendment were added to the Constitution it would cast doubt upon the constitutionality of the law.

Every State has laws to regulate the institution of marriage, to regulate matters of divorce, to regulate the support of families, and so on. There are laws with regard to the powers and capacities of married men and married women to convey property and to make wills.

In North Carolina, for example, we have a law which imposes an obligation upon the husband and the father to support the wife and the children of the marriage. The equal rights amendment to the Constitution would wipe out that law and would put the same obligation upon the wife and the mother as it does upon the husband and the father to support the family.

We have in North Carolina a law which says that a wife can disinherit her husband entirely, but that a husband cannot disinherit his wife or deprive her of the property which she would take under the interstate laws of North Carolina. If the equal rights amendment were to become a part of the Constitution it would destroy that law, and we would not know what the law is on that point.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Would not the amendment we agreed to do away with the possibilities the Senator is talking about?

Mr. ERVIN. I think the amendment we agreed to would have that effect. But we should not engage in shadowboxing. The proposed amendment to the Constitution in its original form, while it appears to be fair upon its face, is so unwise that we ought to reject it. If adopted in its original form, it would put in doubt the validity of every State law regulating marriage, divorce, care and custody of the family, as well as all State laws relating to the rights of married men and married women to acquire, to convey and to devise property. It would also put in doubt the provision of the social security law fixing the dates for the retirement of men and women.

As the Senator from Arizona has very well said, the amendment would put in doubt every law of every State making distinctions between the labor of men and the labor of women. I wish to say, I think there is a difference between men and women, and I thank God for the difference. [Laughter.] I do not think we can wipe it out by legislation.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. SCOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina, and then I should like to yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I commend the Senator for bringing out these facts. I think many people who are advocating equal rights for women do not realize they are seeking to take away a lot of rights which the women now have, and the men do not have. That is what I have tried to bring to the attention of Senators time and time again, when amendments such as this have been proposed.

I agree with the Senator that we ought not to submit any proposed amendment to the Constitution to take away the rights of our good women of the grand old United States.

Mr. ERVIN. It would bring the women down the our level.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. There are many ladies in the United States, and indeed, there are quite a few in the gallery, who are interested in the proposed constitutional amendment. It is a very strange procedure that a proposed constitutional amendment should be brought before the Senate apparently with no sponsor and nobody to manage the joint resolution on the floor.

To say the least, I was shocked when the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona was accepted, on a voice vote, after very little debate, with no one to present the other side.

I certainly am not managing the joint resolution, but I know there is a great deal of interest on the part of a vast number of people in the proposed constitutional amendment. I think the Senate owes some little courtesy in that regard. At least the joint resolution should have a parent. When a joint resolution is before the Senate, some Senator ought to be present to speak for it.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I should like to add one more thing. The proposed constitutional amendment would confer upon the Federal courts the power to pass upon the validity of every State law relating to all the matters I mentioned, and to hundreds of other matters. It would likewise cast doubt upon the validity of many acts of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment which was agreed to.

Mr. President, I now desire to speak upon another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

CHANNEL ASSIGNMENT BY FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION TO LOCAL OUTLET IN VAIL MILLS, N.Y.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have been waiting since 12 o'clock for this opportunity to speak.

Mr. President, I have read with interest two recent statements by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] relating to a hearing examiner's recommendations for a channel assignment by the Federal Communications Commission to a local outlet in Vail Mills, N.Y.

I regret that I was not on the floor at the time of these remarks, because it seems to me the junior Senator from Wisconsin was committing the very error of which he complained in the FCC preliminary decision; that is, using congressional membership as an influence in a television decision of the Federal Communications Commission. I can speak impartially in this matter as I have no such interest in TV or radio ownership.

If I interpret his remarks correctlly, the Senator charged that a decision favorable to one applicant will definitely be forthcoming because that applicant has among its stockholders five Congressmen who own less than 6 percent of its stock.

I might add, Mr. President, if that sort of objection were valid it might involve the interests of a great number of Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives. If this is so, we may well consider whether such ownership should be considered as permissible by the adoption of a code of ethical conduct by Members of Congress.

The Senator based his judgment on a decision by a hearing examiner and on an announcement that the Commission will affirm the examiner.

Under the Administrative Procedures Act and the Communications Act, an impartial examiner conducted a hearing in this case, in which all parties participated. The examiner then made an initial decision, using various criteria set up by the Commission to determine which applicant is best qualified to serve the public interest.

In applying one of these criteria, that of "civic participation," the examiner's statement called attention to the fact that the Congressmen, who were stockholders, would have the ability to discern and be responsive to the interests of the people of their community.

After a full hearing and listening to oral argument on the exceptions to the initial decision, the Commission announced it would affirm the examiner.

However, the instructions given to the staff on the effect the presence among the stockholders of these Congressmen will have on the decision, were not made public—nor was the vote of the Commission—and the decision is still in the process of being written.

After it is prepared, it must come back to the Commission for a final vote.

When the final decision does come before the Commission, any Commissioner can, of course, change his vote.

I do not attempt to judge, in the absence of knowledge of what the record contains, what is a proper decision.

If a grant to this applicant would be "political payola," as the Senator charges, it would seem to me he opens himself to the allegation that he is engaging in an ex parte attempt to influence the Federal Communications Commission to change its final vote—the very type of activity the junior Senator from Wisconsin deplores, and which the Congress desires to prevent.

I believe that Senators should not attempt to be the judges in cases they have not heard and of which they speak only as an advocate of one side—at least not until trials are completed and decisions are made final.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Pennsylvania notified me that he was going to make this speech. He sent me a copy of his speech, and I very much appreciate it. I ask the Senator this question. At the beginning of his speech, in referring to himself, he said:

> I can speak impartially in this matter as I have no such interest in TV or radio ownership.

To make sure there is no ambiguity in the Senator's statement, I presume he meant that he has no financial investment. I presume he did not mean that he has no sense of responsibility or no interest in the subject of who owns radio or television stations.

Mr. SCOTT. No. I am as interested as is any Senator or citizen in seeing that the decisions of the Federal Communications Commission are fair and impartial. My reference was intended to make clear to the Senate that I have no financial interest in any television or radio concern of any kind. I simply seek to point out—and I know the Senator will understand my point—that none of us should indulge in any kind of comment that would tend to influence decisions of the Federal Communications Commission. I hold no brief for the applicants about which we have spoken, or any other applicants. I speak only of the judgment of the Commission, and hope that the Commission will be unhampered by any outside source.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I merely wished to make sure there was no insinuation—and I know the Senator from Pennsylvania did not intend to imply such—that he is unique in this controversy in having no interest in any radio or television station; but that I might have such an interest. I do not know the identity of the stockholders of any of the applicants whose applications were denied. The only knowledge I have of the stockholders who were granted temporarily and tentatively the license is that there were five Congressmen who were minor stockholders.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to say that it never entered my mind to imply in anyway that the Senator from Wisconsin has any interest in any of these matters in that connection.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wanted to make clear that point. I noticed the Senator has said:

> After a full hearing and listening to oral argument on the exceptions to the initial decision, the Commission announced it would affirm the examiner.

This announcement was a public announcement which was carried in the New York Herald Tribune. It was carried in the Washington Post. It was an affirmation by the Commission of the examiner's decision. I have checked and I find that this is a decision which, while not formally final, is virtually final.

I invite the Senator from Pennsylvania to indicate if he will any instance in which the Federal Communications Commission has made a decision affirming the examiner and then has reversed its decision?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no familiarity whatever with the dockets of the Federal Communications Commission. The point I have made, as I am sure the Senator understands, is that the decision has not been written. Some of the members of the Commission may vote against the decision, some may change prior votes. Criticism at this time would perhaps operate to create in the minds of some that a Commissioner who actually intends to vote against the decision is in fact making himself a party to the affirmative position. Since the decision has not been written, in my opinion the criticism was premature.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The New York Herald Tribune in the article reporting the situation, said:

> A company with five Congressmen as stockholders has been commended for such "civic participation" and tentatively awarded a valuable Federal license to run a television station.
> The Federal Communications Commission in what appeared to be a precedent-shattering decision, acted after the examiner in the case, J. D. Bond, ruled that "it cannot be ignored" that some of the stockholders are Members of "the House of Representatives."
> This, we found, gave the firm an edge over a rival applicant in the area of "civic participation," one of the yardsticks used by the FCC in deciding contested cases.

It then went on to report:

> It was believed to be the first time that a regulatory agency had apparently supported the position that an applicant which has Congressmen among its stockholders thereby gains an advantage over its rival.

In this news comment carried in this fine paper, the New York Herald Tribune said:

> This should be good news for Congressmen who are in a position to allow or disallow funds for the FCC and who can pass laws affecting the agency's operations.

I think anybody reading that article would certainly construe that to be a conclusion on the part of the reporter, for which the city editor and the newspaper took responsibility, indicates the kind of morally adverse consequences this decision can have. Now, was the New York Herald Tribune prejudging this decision of the FCC?

What I wish to emphasize to the Senator from Pennsylvania is that this was not a tentative decision by the examiner. This was a decision that the Commission had affirmed, and indicates a position that they had taken. Once a public announcement has been made by an agency of the Government of the position that it intends to take in a case, to say that any comment on the floor of the Senate and in public on that announcement is out of order or ex parte would throttle legitimate and proper criticism and discussion of administrative agencies. After all, where is the terminal point? After the Commission makes its final decision, an appeal can be had to the court, and until then the judicial process has not been completed. It is true that these applications must be renewed 3 years from now, and if we follow the logic of the Senator from Pennsylvania, it seems to me that we can never comment on these situations.

Mr. SCOTT. May I say to the Senator from Wisconsin that at this present moment I do not even know the name of the television station or its owners. I have no knowledge of the docket. I have no intent to be represented as advocating, pro or con, any decision. I feel that if Members of the Congress have an interest in television or radio stations, and it is felt that such interest is improper, a code of ethical conduct should be considered.

I addressed my comments solely to the fact that until there has been a written decision giving the reasons for the Commission's decision, stating which Commissioners favor and which Commissioners oppose the decision, premature criticism operates unfairly upon those Commissioners whose opinions have not been heard and whose dissents have not been heard. What the Senator from Wisconsin has done in effect is to give a blanket condemnation of the entire Commission. My point is for fairness, and against prejudging.

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that at no time did I make any statement that indicated that one or the other applicants should receive the award. What I did was to discuss only the single principle that ownership of stock by Congressmen should not be construed as a favorable criterion. The Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission came to my office and he admitted in my office that it is a settled policy of the FCC to give preferred consideration to applicants who include Congressmen as owners. They do that on the basis that Members of Congress are civic minded people who have an interest in their constituents. It is this principle that I made explicitly and repeatedly clear in my statement on the floor of the Senate on June 20 and on June 24, and I invite the Senator from Pennsylvania to indicate anything in my statement which went further than simply to discuss that principle.

Mr. SCOTT. May I say to the Senator from Wisconsin that it is my impression that the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission did not vote and excluded himself from the decision.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is absolutely correct. The Chairman of the FCC was not acting in an ex parte way. He disqualified himself. He was not a party in any sense to the decision. I am not saying that he was. The Chairman of the FCC had every right to come to my office, but I do say that he affirmed to me the fact that congressional preference is a settled position and policy on the part of the FCC. That is why I repeated my assertion and charge on the floor on June 24, and it was directed entirely to this principle. I do not care at all about who gets a channel in Albany, as the Senator from Pennsylvania indicates that he does not.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator understands that I have made the point that Chairman Ford himself has disassociated himself from the decision.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. SCOTT. I wanted to be particularly sure that we were being entirely fair to Chairman Ford and, in a larger sense, to the Commission.

The Senator from Wisconsin knows that neither he nor I have any personal interest in the matter. I am approaching it from the standpoint of whether or not comments, prior to the Commission's decision, ought to be made. I respect the Senator's right to disagree with me, and I know he respects my view.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I feel very strongly that it was an extremely bad reason that was given by the examiner. In view of the fact that the Chairman of the FCC affirmed this was a settled policy of the FCC, I had the duty to protest it as publicly and promptly as I could, on the floor of the Senate. I did that. The Senator from Pennsylvania has indicated very generously that he recognizes that I have no other interest in doing it.

Mr. SCOTT. I believe this helps clear up the matter. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I now yield to the senior Senator from New York for a question, with the understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor, so preciously obtained.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I had in mind utilizing the moment yielded to me by my colleague to tell the Senate about a situation involving Japanese students who were in the riots and their leaders, reflecting great credit on the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], but in view of our crowded calendar, I shall do so when we return. At that time I will introduce all the data and information, confining myself to this observation at this point.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 3450) to amend section 22 (relating to the endowment and support of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts) of the act of June 29, 1935, to increase the authorized appropriation for resident teaching grants to land-grant institutions.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to each of the following bills of the Senate:

H.R. 5055. An act to change a certain restriction on the use of certain real property heretofore conveyed to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., by the United States; and

H.R. 7004. An act to facilitate the administration of the public lands, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 16 to the bill (H.R. 12740) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes; that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 14, and 17 to the bill, and that the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate numbered 15 to the bill, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 1315. An act for the incorporation of the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc.; and

S. 3076. An act for the relief of Daisy Pong Hi Tong Li.

PAY RAISES FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I observe that both the Washington Post and the Evening Star in today's issues devote their leading editorials to the vote which overrode the President's veto of the Federal pay bill. The Washington Post, not ordinarily the President's most vigorous supporter, in this case has written a very constructive, firm, clear, and objective analysis of the vote and the reasons for it. It is very critical of the action of the Senate.

Likewise, the Evening Star, which headed its editorial "Strictly Political," speaks of "all pretense to fiscal responsibility on Capitol Hill perished in the scramble for November votes."

I ask unanimous consent that both editorials may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 2, 1960]

VETO-LEAPING PAY BILL

Almost everyone in Washington is pleased to see Government employees get a raise, but the circumstances in which the present salary increases have been voted over the President's veto certainly reflect no credit on the Congress. Both the House and Senate responded to pressure on the eve of the national campaigns, despite the glaring inequities in the bill before them. It seems highly improbable that this measure would have become law if Congress had had the restraint to wait until January, when political pressures will be less acute and when the grade-by-grade salary study which Congress itself had ordered at a cost of half a million dollars will have been completed.

President Eisenhower's complaints against the bill were neither trifling nor partisan. In view of the fact that the cost of living has increased only 2.1 percent since the last salary adjustment of 10 percent in June 1958, the new adjustments ranging from 7½ to nearly 9 percent are clearly excessive. The Government should, of course, be fair to its employees, but these pay boosts at a cost of three-quarters of a billion dollars have to be weighed against the many other demands on the Treasury. It cannot be reasonably said that Federal pay adjustments should have preference over all the other public needs that Congress has thus far failed to approve.

Congress refusal to act on the recommended increases in postal rates, while adding $248 million in salary costs to the immense deficit of the Post Office Department, is certainly an irresponsible performance. Though Congress has set up a balanced budget for the postal system as an objective, it recklessly boosts expenses without concern as to where the revenue is coming from.

The complaint of inequities in the bill also seems to be well founded. Why were postal employees given more generous raises in general than employees under the Classification Act? The bill also magnifies the inequities in the present Federal-wage structure by giving the largest raises to employees whose salaries are already high relative to those paid for comparable work in private industry. The extention of Federal retirement and insurance benefits to groups of county employees who are not responsible to the Federal Government seems to be utterly inexcusable. This precedent is certain to arise to the embarrassment of future Congresses.

There are indications that some legislators originally voted for this unfortunate pay bill on the assumption that it would be vetoed and would not become law. If that is the case, their reliance on a veto proved to be a costly mistake. Having committed themselves, the vast majority of legislators in both Houses could not turn back without serious political embarrassment. More than anything else, the performance on this bill proves the unwisdom of allowing Federal pay legislation to come to a head at a time when Congress is not really in a position to deliberate upon it.

[From the Washington Star]

STRICTLY POLITICAL

The decisive margins by which the House and the Senate overrode the President's veto of the Federal pay bill are explainable only in terms of election year politics. All pretense to fiscal responsibility on Capitol Hill perished in the scramble for November votes.

The pay raise bill is bad legislation in several respects. It will cost the taxpayers about $750 million a year. Percentagewise, the pay increases are far in excess of the rise in the cost of living since a 10 percent salary increase was approved 2 years ago. Existing inequities in the pay structure are magnified. The increase for the postal workers, generally higher than that for others, will add some $248 million to the already large postal deficit. Yet Congress, despite the fact that it has approved the objective of a balanced postal budget, refused to increase postal rates to pay any part of the cost of the pay raise. Finally, the legislators, in their display of irresponsibility, bowed to pressure tactics in a surrender which certainly will come back to plague them in future years.

The Democrats who control the Congress are primarily responsible for this unworthy performance—the more unworthy because they were not even willing to wait for the results of a study, which the legislators had ordered and paid for, of the relation of Federal salaries to those paid in private business. The Democrats cannot have it both ways. If they claim credit, as they are entitled to do, when Congress acts responsibly, they must assume the blame when it behaves in thoroughly irresponsible fashion. The Republicans, however, are also culpable. This veto would not have been overridden if all of them had had the political courage to join a handful of Democrats in supporting the President, who was not afraid to put the national interest ahead of the demands of the pressure groups.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. A very strange paradox is developing on the floor of the Senate. The semantics of terms like fiscal responsibility and fiscal irresponsibility have different connotations when differently applied. I cannot understand now who is fiscally responsible and who is fiscally irresponsible in the Senate.

Mr. BUSH. If the Senator will read both editorials, it will help him to come to the conclusion I am sure he wishes to reach.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 69) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the equal rights for men and women.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I move that Senate Joint Resolution 69 be recommitted to the Committe on the Judiciary without instructions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have no objection. In this Congress and in previous Congresses, when this amendment was introduced, I specifically requested an opportunity to appear before the Committeee on the Judiciary, in order that we might discuss the matter. In each instance, without notice to me, and without my having an opportunity to appear before the committee, the joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

If it is sent back to the committee this time, with my amendment attached, the committee will likely look at the amendment. It is entirely agreeable to have the resolution recommitted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the majority leader called this matter before the Senate today on motion. I believe he should be here. He is coming now. I was about to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland to recommit Calendar No. 290, Senate Joint Resolution 69, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is the equal rights amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relative to equal rights for men and women.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Containing, however, an amendment approved by the Senate and offered by the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to lay that motion on that table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

A SALUTE TO THE CHAMPION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS—GEORGE J. BURGER

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, as the affairs of this country grow more complex and the responsibilities of elected representatives increasingly assume international impact, it nevertheless remains important that we continue to observe and study the machinery of our economic system. For after all, it has been our competitive free enterprise system that has largely made it possible for this country to develop the standard of living it has today and to create the countless opportunities by which individuals can develop their creative abilities. The mainspring for our competitive economic machinery is a strong small business community.

As I see it, the continuing existence of a healthy small business group in our country serves four valuable and indispensable functions:

First. It serves to thwart the ever-present trend toward monopoly and concentration, and the power to control prices and markets which necessarily follow.

Second. It forms the basis of a strong middle class which is a necessary balance in any democracy.

Third. It keeps open the avenues for individual opportunity by which the creative talents of our country have historically been free to express themselves.

Fourth. It provides both the nucleus and the incentive for local, responsible leadership in the many communities of America.

It is in this high purpose that one of the great trade associations of this country and its gallant spokesman have for many years been dedicated. I am speaking of the National Federation of Independent Business and its vice president, Mr. George J. Burger.

The federation which Mr. Burger represents has been in existence approximately 16 years now. Its membership totals in excess of 150,000, and it is made up exclusively of independent business and professional men with membership in all 50 States of the Union.

I think it is important to note when talking about the federation that no officer or group of officers is permitted to set the policy for the federation on any legislation or economic problem. Its policy is determined only after a complete nationwide poll of its entire membership, through its informative publication, the Mandate. The resulting vote then determines the stand officially taken by the federation. Every month I receive countless numbers of these ballots from my constituents—copies of the ballots they have forwarded to the local representatives of the National Federation.

The spokesman in Washington for this representative body of American small businessmen is George Burger. Prior to his joining the cause of small business, George Burger successfully owned and operated an independent business for more than a quarter of a century. For some years he represented the independent tire dealers of this country and is today one of the important and recognized authorities in that field. Ever since I have been a Member of this body, George Burger has been trodding up and down Capitol Hill, appearing before committees, and subcommittees, listening to the debates of Congress, visiting the staff members of Senators and committees, always at work, telling people about the problems of small business and what the small businessmen of this country regard as good legislation for the country. For understanding, the small businessmen who George Burger represents are not canvassed as grocers, or druggists, or tire dealers or lawyers, or any one specific group, but rather as Americans interested in the welfare of their country and the continuance of our free enterprise system. George Burger and the National Federation of Independent Business, therefore, are recognized as the outstanding national representatives for small business in this country.

Small business needs such spokesmen. The number of annual business failures in this country increased 96.6 percent from 1952 to 1958. The rate of business failures per 10,000 firms increased during the same period from 28.7 percent to 56 percent. The Small Business Administration reports this increase in business failures was concentrated primarily in small business fields. In addition, the earnings of small manufacturing corporations, after taxes, decreased 28.8 percent from 1951 through 1957 while similar earnings of the large manufacturing corporations during this time increased 32.2 percent. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Retailing, Distribution, and Fair Trade Practices of the Senate Small Business Committee, I am well aware of the many unfair competitive advantages that have developed over the years in favor of large businesses, solely because of their bigness and unrelated to their relative efficiency, skill, or productivity. It was my subcommittee, for instance, that uncovered the fact that many small but highly successful retailers and wholesalers in this country are being discriminated against in the matter of obtaining choice business locations solely and exclusively because of the fact that they had a net worth of less than $1 million. The tax law of 1954 has greatly speeded the forces in our economy toward mergers and concentration.

Furthermore, tax enforcement of the antitrust laws the past 7 years has permitted many new forms of competitive activity to develop which are patently unfair and unethical and tend to make the law of the economic jungle operate in our economic affairs.

Mr. President, I wish to remind my colleagues that an important five-point program designed to strengthen the competitive nature of our economic system was announced by the National Federation of Independent Business at the beginning of this year. This program includes:

First. A tax program that will allow the Nation's more than 3 million self-employed businessmen to finance their private retirement programs on the same basis as their corporate brethren.

Second. Stronger antimerger laws by requiring big business to make advance disclosure of their merger intentions.

Third. Further tax revisions that will provide allowances for increases in inventories and accounts receivable, and that will permit independents to finance estate tax payments through tax-free insurance policies or anticipation certificates.

Fourth. Buying price equality for those forces to compete directly with factory-owned stores operated by their manufacturer-suppliers.

Fifth. Further reduction in Government competition and Federal redtape reporting burdens.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to give these recommendations serious consideration so that when Congress reconvenes, a meaningful program to repair our economic machinery may be passed into law. I urge them also to listen to the valuable advice of George Burger and the National Federation of Independent Business.

AFRICAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is regrettable that Congress did not take more notice of a very important development in the past few days on the Continent of Africa. Everything in Africa is happening literally at once. The political, economic, and technical revolutions which took centuries to develop in the West are happening in years, even months, in Africa.

I know the American people would want the Senate to salute the Republic of the Congo on its independence day. It is a day of hope, not merely for the people of the Congo, but because freedom is indivisible. This is a day of hope and joy for all those who love freedom.

The swift change of Africa from a continent composed principally of colonies to a continent of independent nations has included the proclamation of the Malagasy Republic last Sunday and the beginning of the Somali Republic this past Friday. Earlier this week, Cameroon, Togo, and Mali became independent. The Union of Central African Republics and Gabon, as well as Nigeria, will join the roll of independence within the year.

Mr. President, we Americans congratulate and pledge our support to these new nations because we believe that the American Revolution in its foundations was for all men and all centuries. We believe that all men have a right to hold their heads high without domination by any other man or group of men or nations.

As I said in the Senate earlier this week, we have failed tragically to communicate this belief to the newly emerging nations.

Through a partnership policy with Africans for economic and technical development, I trust that we can demonstrate beyond any doubt that we are determined to work as friends and neighbors of the African nations in common quest for human dignity and freedom.

To this end, I trust Senators will give their full support to the appropriations for the initial program for economic and technical assistance to subtropical Africa proposed for next year and authorized under the mutual security bill of 1960.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial entitled "African Independence Week," published in the New York Times of June 30, 1960, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AFRICAN INDEPENDENCE WEEK

The breathtaking transformation of Africa reaches a new peak of interest this week when 20 million Africans in four former colonial territories covering an area half the size of the United States formally assume their independence. This raises the number of independent African States from 4 at the end of the last war to 16, and their number may reach a score by the end of this year.

For nearly a dozen more territories, some already autonomous and self-governing, some of still undertermined status, also clamor for independence, and except for Algeria, where the majority might vote to stay with France, there is no denying their demands. In contrast to the new Communist imperialism that has already converted all of Eastern Europe and much of Asia into slave colonies, Western imperialism and colonialism are in precipitate retreat in Africa and Asia.

The most notable event in this African Independence Week comes today when the Belgian Congo, the giant among the new states, becomes the independent Republic of Congo, comprising 13 million people and 943,000 square miles. Last Sunday saw the formal proclamation of the independence of Madagascar, the 228,000-square-mile island with 5 million people off the African east coast, as the Malagasy Republic, a member of the French community. And tomorrow will see the creation of the Somali Republic, uniting British Somaliland and Italian Somalia into a new state of 1,800,000 people and 236,000 square miles.

They join Cameroon, Togo, and Mali, which became independent earlier this year. And they will be followed by the Union of Central African Republics, comprising Chad, the former Ubangi-Shari and French Congo, and by Gabon, which are still negotiating their independence charters, and by Nigeria, the largest British territory in Africa, with 34 million people, scheduled to become independent October 1.

The free world will congratulate the new states on the attainment of their independence and welcome them into the comity of nations. Tribute is also due to the former colonial powers which freely liberated them and continue to help and guide them on their new path. But it is necessary to recognize the tremendous difficulties facing them. Inexperience in self-government, tribal warfare, territorial and personal rivalries confront most of them, and the dream of a United States of Africa is too unrealistic at this stage of their development to be a practical solution to their problems, though mutual support and cooperation in all fields may well pave the way to it.

The new Africa that is emerging represents both a challenge and an opportunity to the free world to keep it free.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I realize that these utterances in the Senate are primarily for the RECORD. However, if there is any area in which the security of the United States is being seriously challenged today, it is in a very far-off place which all too often has been looked upon as exotic and exciting; a continent primarily comprised of strange, different people; where the rich and the affluent in our society once went on the so-called safaris. That day of romanticism is all over.

Africa today is a real, living force in the world. In fact, it is a revolutionary force, as Africa springs forth into independence, with many areas gaining their independence, and millions of people coming into self-government. Yet it is in this very area where we are doing little or nothing—so little that it is pathetic—to convey the message of American democracy, or of freedom itself, whether it is American syle, or British or French, or whatever style it may be.

However, the Soviet Union and Communist China have launched, over a considerable period of time, a tremendous program of propaganda and political penetration into Africa.

Africa may be the Dark Continent to us; but it is a continent of pioneering and of exploration. It is a continent which has unbelievable mysteries to be revealed even to its own people. Certainly it is a continent of interest to the Communists infiltrators and to those forces in the world which would like to impose a new kind of imperialism, a new kind of colonialism, on a free people, a people who, within the week, have gained their independence from the old imperial and colonial rule of Western Europe.

Five years from today, unless there is a dramatic change in American policy and effort; unless there is a greatly expanded program of information, education, health, and the use of our food and fiber in the form of expanded economic aid and technical assistance for the peoples of Africa, that continent will be the private hunting grounds of the Communists. The people of Africa want our help. They need the guidance of friendly people. They need the cooperative endeavor of the American people and of other peoples who believe in democracy and freedom.

I have spoken today on this subject because I believe that the duty of a Member of Congress is not merely to report history, but to have some vision as to what might develop. I do not want the United States to be the victim of events.

I should like to help our country create the events which lend themselves to the expansion of the horizons of freedom. I believe that either we will write the history of tomorrow, or it will be written for us by forces which are not friendly to us.

There is no easy way out. It is about time that the people of the United States and the leadership of this Nation recognized that the continent of Africa represents untold wealth and power; that the continent of Africa makes the continent of North America fade into insignificance in size and potential wealth. It is time that the Government of the United States recognized that Africa is a competitive area, an area of competition, where two ways of life will be tested. One way of life is what we call the free way; the other way of life is what the Communists call socialism. I suggest that we will not win that struggle merely by denunciation of an evil force and praising what we believe is the force of righteousness. We will win that struggle if we remember what Edmund Burke, a great British statesman, once said:

Evil triumphs when good men fail to act.

The trouble with Congress is that we enjoy denunciation of the Devil; we enjoy denunciation of the forces of evil; but we are all too reluctant to do what Edmund Burke said—to act.

That has been the trouble with this administration. It has had an overdose of self-righteousness, but it has been on a deficit diet of positive political action. I hope the next administration will concentrate its attention on those areas where the opportunities are many and the problems are great, but the challenges are exciting.

NEED FOR EXPANDED TELEVISION SERVICE

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, 9 months ago I called the Senate's attention to the need for action by the Federal Communications Commission to expand television service. I pointed out that for more than 5 years the FCC had been stalling while some of our most important communities suffered for lack of competitive television stations.

I pointed out in my speech of September 14, 1959, the major markets which are still without competitive television. They include such metropolitan areas as the following: Providence, Louisville, Grand Rapids-Kalamazoo, Charlotte, Syracuse, Rochester, Birmingham, Wheeling-Steubenville, Johnstown-Altoona, Dayton, Champaign-Urbana, Toledo, Jacksonville, Raleigh-Durham, Shreveport, Knoxville, Binghamton, Fresno, and Bakersfield.

Mr. President, it does my ego no good to remark now, 9 months later, that the FCC is almost precisely where it was when I first spoke. The same communities that were then without adequate television service are still without it. The same millions of people who were then deprived of adequate choice in television programing are still deprived of it. It appears that my comments of September 14, 1959, made no impression whatever. For the honor of the U.S. Senate I feel obliged to make a new attempt to penetrate the wall of indifference that seems to surround the FCC.

At the time of my first remarks on this subject, the situation was this:

After more than 5 years of studies and conferences and reports the weight of opinion had concluded that the present allocations system of mixing ultra high frequency and very high frequency stations was impractical. Consequently, that proposal went out.

It had also been concluded that UHF had technical disadvantages that would make an all-UHF system inferior to an all-VHF system. That also went out; and there is nothing in the cards to indicate and there is no evidence to indicate that any new steps will be taken in order to permit advantage to be taken of the opportunity to expand the use of the UHF spectrum. Certainly something should be done to expand the use of that great spectrum.

The FCC, in hopes of expanding the VHF system, was negotiating with the military for a frequency exchange that would provide more VHF channels for television.

But while hoping for an accommodation with the military, the FCC was considering an interim measure to provide more stations in important markets where the scarcities were most severe.

Those were the conditions of September 1959, and, in looking back upon them, I consider that we were in better shape then than we are now.

Since September 1959, it has become evident that no VHF channels can be obtained from the military. The Chairman of the FCC has all but admitted this, in testimony before the Senate Commerce Committee.

Mr. President, at this time, when such remarkable developments are being made in connection with outer space and the nuclear age, there is, on the other hand, little evidence to indicate that the Federal Communications Commission will, in the interest of improving these communications, take steps to permit proper utilization of the parts of the spectrum other than those now being used.

Since September 1959, the FCC has taken but one action to implement the interim policy it had announced. On January 4, 1960, the Commission issued a notice of proposed rulemaking looking toward the issuance of waivers of cochannel VHF minimum separation requirements and the reduction of adjacent channel separation requirements. The purpose would be to fit new stations into the important markets—those I outlined at the beginning of these remarks—that now are underserved.

The notice originally set February 19 and March 7, 1960, as the dates for comments and reply comments. These have, since then, been twice postponed. The dates are now September 1 and 16, 1960.

Mr. President, to give the Senate an idea of the stalling and the gobbledygook and the hopeless mire in which the Federal Communications Commission seems to be bogged down, as regards giving millions of the American people an opportunity to make full use of the television facilities they are entitled to use, I desire to read a letter, dated June 21, addressed by the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Communications, of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., June 21, 1960.

Hon. JOHN O. PASTORE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Communications, Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PASTORE: This is with reference to the Commission's letter to you dated April 1, 1960, concerning the status of our discussions with the executive branch about the feasibility of changing the table of frequency allocations so as to improve the television allocation situation. That letter reported that Commission representatives had been informed an attempt would be made by the executive branch to reach a firm position on the Commission's proposals within 6 weeks, i.e., by approximately May 15, 1960.

We now have been informed that it has not as yet been possible for the executive branch to prepare a properly staffed and coordinated reply to the Commission's two proposals. It was explained that when the May 15 date was advanced the complexities of considering the differing impact upon existing spectrum occupancy of two separate proposals had not been fully appreciated. Also, that since a proper and thoroughly considered reply or replies must be based upon the best available source material, background information and estimates and assumptions, more time is required than previously had been anticipated.

The executive branch official whose office is working on the matter now estimates that answers to our proposals may be completed by about the end of July or the first part of August 1960.

As stated in the Commission's April 1 letter, we are aware of your continuing interest in this matter and expect to keep you fully informed of developments.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK W. FORD,
Chairman.

I may say that they have had some time—more than 5 years—to work on this; but absolutely nothing has been accomplished.

Mr. President, present developments make it possible for us to communicate with our satellites which are nearly in orbit around the sun; yet we are still unable to solve the simple matter of directional antennas in order to provide adequate service to the major cities and to take care of the drop in service to many of the major cities. It seems to me that while we are solving the mysteries of the nuclear age and the mysteries of modern electronics, we are, on the other hand, going backward as regards our attempts to solve the mysteries of bureaucracy; and as a case in point, I refer the Senate to the letter I have just read to this body.

Mr. President, on the basis of the FCC's record in this matter, I would not be surprised to find myself observing the same conditions 9 months from now. I should say I would not be surprised, but I would be disappointed. And I am certain that the millions of people who are being shortchanged in their television fare would be disappointed, too.

RIGHT TO BARGAIN FOR JOB SECURITY AND STABILIZATION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Southern Exposure," which was published in the July 1, 1960, issue of the Locomotive Engineer.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTHERN EXPOSURE

S. 3548, which would deprive employees of their right to bargain for job security and stabilization, is a vicious piece of legislation. All those Senators and Representatives who are not puppets of the Association of American Railroads and the National Association of Manufacturers should quickly realize how bad it is.

They will not be deceived by the sort of letters which will result from the directive put out by D. H. MacLeod, Southern Railway superintendent, to a large group of supervisory personnel.

The Southern official's directive, a classic of its kind, read as follows:

"Please find attached hereto photocopy of Senate Bill No. 3548, a proposed amendment to the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the National Labor Relations Act and the Railway Labor Act, which was introduced by Senator DIRKSEN, of Illinois, on May 13, 1960 and referred to the Committee on Judiciary.

"I want each of you gentlemen, immediately to write your Congressman asking that he support above mentioned bill and give me copy of your letter for my files. I would like to have copies of these letters in my files no later than Friday, June 10. Please also find attached copy of letter I have written to one of our Congressmen which may be used as a guide—do not duplicate this letter. Do not use Southern Railway stationery, use your personal stationery. For your information, I am attaching list of U.S. Congressmen from State of Alabama, by district.

"Each of you should also contact several in your respective territory and encourage them to write letters to their Congressmen requesting that they support Senate Bill No. 3548. I would also like to have names of the individuals you contact."

So barks MacLeod, and he plainly is saying that lesser Southern officials had better jump or they will wish there were some kind of written job stabilization for supervisory personnel.

REGULATION OF THE PRACTICE OF PHYSICAL THERAPY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1899, Senate bill 675.

Thereupon the court, with or without notice and hearing, as it in its discretion may decide, shall make such order as is proper and may punish as a contempt any failure to comply with such order in accordance with the provisions of subsection (c), section 5, of the Act of April 1, 1942 (56 Stat. 193, chapter 207; sec. 11–756(c), D. C. Code, 1951 edition).

REGISTRATION

SEC. 8. The Commissioners shall register as physical therapists all applicants who prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners their fitness for registration under the terms of this Act. REGISTRATION WITHOUT EXAMINATION

SEC. 9. The Commissioners shall register as a physical therapist, without examination, any physical therapist who is at least twenty years of age and of good moral character and who presents evidence satisfactory to the Commissioners that she was, prior to the effective date of this Act, practicing physical therapy in the District of Columbia for a period of two years immediately preceding the effective date of this Act, and that she (1) has graduated from an approved school of physical therapy listed in the register of approved schools or (2) received comparable training or experience in the practice of physical therapy as determined by the Commissioners. The fee for registration under this section shall be $25. Application for registration under this section shall be made on or before the expiration of one year from the effective date of this Act.

(c) Be in good physical and mental health, as certified by a physician licensed to practice in the District of Columbia.

(d) Be a graduate of an approved school of physical therapy listed in the register of approved schools; or possess comparable educational qualifications as determined by the Commissioners.

The examinations specified in this section shall be conducted at such times and places as the Commissioners may determine, and notice of time and place of such examination shall be published not less than thirty days before the first day of each examination in one or more newspapers of local circulation.

The examination shall embrace such coverage of the following subjects to determine the applicant's qualification: The applied sciences of anatomy, neuroanatomy, kinesiology, physiology, pathology, physics; "physical therapy" as defined in this Act, applied to medicine, neurology, orthopedics, pediatrics, psychiatry, surgery; medical ethics; technical procedures in the practice of "physical therapy" as defined in this Act. It is intended that the standards of education and training required for registration under this section shall be substantially equivalent to those required for registration pursuant to section 10 of this Act. The fee for registration pursuant to this section shall be $25. This section shall be construed to apply only to candidates from States which admit physical therapists of the District of Columbia without examination.

RENEWAL OF REGISTRATION

On or before February 15 of each year, the Commissioners shall mail an application for renewal of registration to every person who at the time of such mailing holds a valid registration under this Act. The applicant shall, before the following March 1, complete and execute such application and file the same to the Commissioners with a renewal fee of $5. Upon receipt of such application and fee, the Commissioners shall verify the accuracy of the application and issue to the applicant a certificate of renewal for the year beginning on April 1 and expiring the following March 31. Any registrant who allows her registration to lapse by failing to renew the registration as provided above, may be reinstated by the Commissioners by showing cause satisfactory to the Commissioners for such failure and on payment of a renewal fee of $10. The Commissioners are authorized, after a public hearing, to change from time to time, the period for which the registration or renewal thereof may be issued, and the time for mailing an application for renewal of registration and the time for the filing of such application.

(b) Any person registered under the provisions of this Act but not so practicing in the District of Columbia shall give written notice of such fact to the Commissioners. Upon receipt of such notice, the Commissioners shall place the name of such person upon the nonpracticing list. While remaining on such list, such person shall not be subject to the payment of any renewal fee and shall not hold herself out as a registered physical therapist nor practice as such in the District of Columbia. Application for renewal of registration and payment of renewal fee for the current year shall be made to the Commissioners by any such person desiring to resume practice as registered physical therapist.

DENIAL, REVOCATION AND SUSPENSION OF REGISTRATION

SEC. 13. The Commissioners are authorized and empowered to deny, revoke, or suspend any registration or certificate of renewal of registration issued by the Commissioners or applied for in accordance with the provisions of this act if the applicant or holder thereof—

(1) has been guilty of fraud or deceit in procuring or attempting to procure any registration or renewal thereof provided for in this Act;

(3) is an intemperate consumer of intoxicating liquors or is addicted to the use of habit-forming drugs;

(8) is otherwise professionally incapacited.

Provided, That such denial, revocation, or suspension shall be made only upon specific charges in writing. A copy of any such charges and at least ten days' notice of the hearing of the same shall be mailed to the holder of or applicant for such registration, addressed to her at her last known address.

COURT REVIEW

SEC. 14. Any person aggrieved by any final decision or final order of the Commissioners denying, suspending, or revoking any registration, or renewal of registration, issued or applied for under this Act may obtain a review thereof in the municipal court of appeals for the District of Columbia, and may seek a review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit of any judgment of the municipal court of appeals entered pursuant to its review of any such decision or order, all in accordance with subsection (f) of section 7 of the Act approved April 1, 1942, as added by the Act approved August 31, 1954 (68 Stat. 1049).

SEC. 18. (a) Prosecutions for violations of any provisions of section 4, 15, or 16 of this Act shall be conducted in the name of the District of Columbia in the municipal court for the District of Columbia, by the Corporation Counsel or any of his assistants.

(b) It shall be necessary to prove in any prosecution or hearing under this Act only a single act prohibited by law or a single holding out or an attempt without proving a general course of conduct in order to constitute a violation.

FEES AND CHARGES

SEC. 19. (a) The Commissioners are authorized and empowered, from time to time, to increase or decrease any fee specified in this Act. The Commissioners are, also, authorized to fix, and from time to time, increase or decrease fees for any other services rendered under this Act. The Commissioners shall, pursuant to this section, increase, decrease, or fix fees in such amounts as will, in the judgment of the Commissioners, approximate the costs to the District of Columbia of administering this Act: Provided, That no fee shall be increased, decreased, or fixed except after a public hearing.

(b) Upon the change of a registration period as authorized by subsection (a) of section 12 the fee for registration or renewal of registration shall be prorated on the basis of the time covered.

SEC. 22. Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to affect the authority vested in the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia by Reorganization Plan Numbered 5 of 1952 (66 Stat. 824). The performance of any function vested by this Act in the Board of Commissioners or in any office or agency under the jurisdiction and control of said Board of Commissioners may be delegated by said Board of Commissioners in accordance with section 3 of such plan.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 23. This Act shall take effect ninety days after funds are appropriated for the purpose of administering the provisions of this Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a bill similar to this measure was passed by the Senate in the 85th Congress, but was reconsidered, upon motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

This year, the point of difficulty, which was the defining of the field of physical therapy, has been overcome by an O'Mahoney amendment which is acceptable to all interested groups, and was adopted unanimously by the committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 provides that the bill may be cited as the "Physical Therapists Practice Act".

Section 2 defines the terms used in the bill. It should be noted that subsection (c) defines physical therapy. The term "supervised" is included in the definition to make clear that there is no intention on the part of the committee that physical therapists shall be empowered by this act to set up a separate practice without medical supervision. The term "supervised," however, does not, in this context, embrace the actual presence of a medical doctor during the course of treatment prescribed by him. The prescription of the treatment is entirely a matter of judgment upon the part of a medical doctor, but the actual performance of the physical therapy need not take place in his immediate presence.

Section 3 exempts from the provisions of the bill any person employed by the Federal Government in the District of Columbia while such a person is engaged in the discharge of official duties.

Section 4(a) provides a prohibition against the practice of physical therapy in the District of Columbia by an individual unless the person is registered under provisions of the bill or is exempt from registration by the terms of the bill.

Section 4(b) prohibits individuals not registered or exempt under the bill from representing themselves as being registered, certified, licensed, or authorized to practice physical therapy.

Section 4(c) restricts to registered physical therapists under this bill the use of the terms "physical therapist," "physiotherapist," and "physical therapy technician," as well as the initials "P.T.," "P.T.T.," and "R.P.T.," or any other letters, words, abbreviations or insignia implying that the holder is registered under the bill.

Section 4(d) exempts from the operation of this measure any person duly licensed or registered in the District under any other act in the practice for which he is registered or licensed, of an occupation or profession.

Section 4(e) contains an exemption from this act for those practicing under the Healing Arts Practice Act and those employed in their offices under their immediate supervision. The committee, of course, realizes that physicians would be fully justified in assigning routine tasks in connection with the treatment of disability and injury. The committee realizes that to write an ironclad ruling on this point might preclude physicians from allowing competent people to perform simple and routine procedures. It has, therefore, exempted from the operation of this act those employed under the immediate supervision of a licensed medical doctor. The committee is mindful, however, that the progress of physical therapy involves the increasing use of electronic modalities, employment of which in the treatment of disability and disease calls for a high degree of professional skill. It may be that the progress in this direction will be so great that within 5 years the committee will want to study again the situation to insure that the public is fully protected against the employment of persons not totally competent to perform the techniques and operate the modalities involved. In the meantime, this exemption is not to be construed as authorizing any person to assign to another person a task which is beyond the professional competence of that person. It is clearly understood that the physician or surgeon so assigning any person in his employ shall be prepared to justify the professional competence of that person.

Section 5 permits the Commissioners to delegate their powers under the bill.

Section 6 provides for the establishment, composition, qualifications, and remuneration of a board of examiners. It permits the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint a "physical therapists examining board * * * composed of such persons and possessing such qualifications as the Commissioners shall determine." This is a broad delegation of authority to the Commissioners. The committee intends that the Commissioners in making such appointment shall be mindful of the necessity of appointing persons whose professional qualifications in physical therapy and whose dedication to the public interest are such that the actions of the Board will have not only the force of the law but command the respect of the profession and the public.

Section 7 authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to adopt necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of the bill. In addition it requires the Commissioners to "maintain a register of approved schools which they deem afford adequate training in physical therapy." The committee is familiar with the many problems which arise in ascertaining standards and then measuring the professional training of individuals against that standard. The committee points out that the Commissioners will certainly, with respect to schools in the United States, be well advised in selecting schools for listing on the approved register to ascertain that they meet substantially the requirements for accrediting by the Council of Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association. There are problems in connection with the approval of foreign schools. The committee understands that foreign schools, particularly those in Europe, offer curriculums that are not directly comparable to those offered in American schools. Nevertheless, the graduates of such schools are recognized as fully qualified physical therapists. The committee intends that Commissioners approve such schools for listing on its register as in their judgment offer a course of instruction which adequately prepares graduates to exercise the professional responsibilities for physical therapists as required in this act.

Section 7(b) permits the Commissioners to make studies and investigations necessary for them to perform their functions and provides them with authority to take testimony under oath and to issue subpenas.

Section 8 directs that qualified applicants shall be registered and furnished with evidence of proper registration.

Section 9 establishes standards for registration without examination under certain standards.

Section 10 provides that the Commissioners shall conduct examinations and establish standards needed to be met by applicants in addition to the examination on such factors as age, character, health, and education. Fees for the examination are prescribed.

Section 11 provides for reciprocity to physical therapists licensed in other jurisdictions having comparable standards and prescribes the fees to be charged for the service.

Section 12 provides for the annual renewal of registration and the establishment of a nonpracticing list.

Section 13 establishes procedures for the denial, revocation, and suspension of registration to a person under listed circumstances relating to fraud, conviction of crimes involving moral turpitude, alcoholic or drug addiction, willful violation of rules and regulations established by the Commissioners under the legislation, mental incompetency, practice of medicine or physical therapy independently of prescription or direction of a person licensed to practice under the Healing Arts Practice Act, or who is otherwise professionally incapacitated. Section 13 further provides that 10 days after notice of hearing has been mailed the registration can be denied, suspended, or revoked.

Section 14 establishes procedures for court review of final decisions and orders of the Commissioners in performing their functions under the legislation.

Section 15 provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell or fraudulently obtain for any person a diploma, license, certificate of registration, or document required by the legislation or by the Commissioners under their authority; practice physical therapy under any fraudulently procured record or document; use a designation implying registration unless registered; practice during any period of suspension or revocation.

Section 16 restricts the practice of physical therapy in the treatment of human ailments to that performed under the direction of a licensed practitioner of the healing arts.

Section 17 provides penalties. Violation of the provisions of section 4, 15, or 16 of the act would be a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of $500 or not more than 1 year of imprisonment or both.

Section 18 provides for prosecution of violations and establishes that a single proved instance of violation shall be sufficient to convict.

Section 19 provides for the fixing and changes of fees specified in the legislation after public hearing by the Commissioners in order to provide funds for the administration of the legislation approximate to the costs thereof. Fees are to be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia.

Section 20 is the severability clause.

Section 21 authorizes appropriations to carry out the functions of the act.

Section 22 relates to Reorganization Plan No. 5 and the transferability of functions thereunder.

Section 23 provides that this act shall take effect 90 days after funds are appropriated for the purpose of administering the provisions of this act.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the bill has been cleared with the leadership on both sides, and has a unanimous report from the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 675) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

"SCANDALS" IN THE INTERSTATE HIGHWAY PROGRAM

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. In the past few days I have received from Nebraska several letters expressing concern about so-called scandals uncovered in our interstate highway program and its construction.

In each instance the writers refer to an article published in a current issue of the Reader's Digest, entitled "Our Great Big Highway Bungle." For purposes of reference, Mr. President, I ask consent to insert this article at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR GREAT BIG HIGHWAY BUNGLE

(By Karl Detzer)

(Haste, waste, mismanagement and outright graft are making a multi-billion-dollar rathole out of the Federal highway program. If you want honest value for your tax dollars that are going into this 40,000-mile muddle, now is the time to make yourself heard.)

The American people in 1956 were sold a beautiful $27 billion dream—a 40,000-mile superhighway network that would sweep majestically from coast to coast and border to border. This greatest engineering project of all time would, we were told, be a splendid monument to a free people's wisdom, daring, foresight, and skill.

Its highways would, by 1975, knit together all the States, most large cities and hundreds of smaller towns. Its smooth, gently graded, no-stop-sign roads—four, six, and sometimes eight lanes wide—would speed interstate travel, strengthen defense, reduce accidents, save mileage, cut trucking rates, open new recreational areas, expand tourist trade, hasten produce from factory to consumer, and farm to market. The program would create 440,000 new jobs and check the recession that then threatened. What was more, it would pay for itself painlessly out of our Federal taxes on tires and our 3-cents-a-gallon Federal gasoline tax.

Today it must be reported that the dream has become a nightmare: Of recklessness, extravagance, special privilege, bureaucratic stupidity, and sometimes outright thievery.

While the entire network was originally scheduled to cost $27 billion, the Bureau of Public Roads had to admit within 2 years that unexpected additional costs had already arisen. The official figure was quietly raised to just under $40 billion. Yet today even this figure is entirely misleading. For one thing, it ignores the proposed $5 billion reimbursement to the States for their previously built toll roads and turnpikes that have been incorporated into the system. For another, it does not recognize a little matter of a billion and a half dollars as the cost of relocating public utilities and railroads that lie in the path of the new roads.

A new official figure is due in January 1961. Already many engineers and builders privately estimate that $50 billion will not touch the total cost. And meanwhile the Federal gas tax has climbed to 4 cents, and Congress is considering another hike.

What has gone wrong? Why?

Local need and local greed.

The first trouble is that Uncle Sam is paying most of the bill, with little control written into the law. The Federal Government simply shovels out the money for the States to spend. This has invited irresponsibility and inefficiency. Local self-interest and greed—at the expense of the general good—are in the saddle all over the country.

The Federal Government, out of tire and gasoline taxes, puts up 90 cents of each dollar. Each State adds its own thin dime (12 western public-lands States pay even less) for work done within its borders. Federal engineers help draw a rough, overall map of the system and set minimum—but not maximum—standards. From there on the States take over. They decide how much money they need, how much right-of-way to buy, where and at what price. They decide on the type of paving, how thick the surface shall be, on how much of what kind of base to pour it, and what types of bridges to build. They let their own contracts. Though Federal engineers are supposed to approve every yard of highway to make sure there has been no waste, the inspections are usually sketchy and infrequent. There just aren't enough engineers in the Government to supervise a program of such magnitude.

So it's hardly surprising that with good old Uncle dishing out the cash, many a community has developed some pretty grandiose needs. Or that many a State official has developed an easy-come, easy-go attitude.

Consider, for example, a lonely, sparsely settled area in Nevada (which pays only a nickel out of each dollar). Three expensive interchanges have been completed in a 3-mile stretch of interstate highway. The cost of the interchanges runs to $358,000. Why were they built? According to the U.S. General Accounting Office, a survey had shown that an average of 89 cars a day entered or left the main highway from the dusty desert roads that intersect it. Now this tiny flow of traffic is handled in style. One interchange leads to a road that serves a railroad shanty and little else. The second gives access to a single ranch. The third, accounting for most of the 89 cars, leads to some abandoned mines, 4 or 5 small ranches, an electric-power line, and a bawdy house which has recently shut up shop.

Consider the duplications of existing highways that are popping up everywhere. No matter what broad, safe roads may sweep across a State, other roads are being built parallel to them not far away. In a study of only 11 States, the General Accounting Office found 8 planning new highways shoulder to shoulder with existing toll roads. The reasoning in such cases seems to be: since the Government is spending the money, it may as well spend some our way.

Consider the building of city roads at Uncle Sam's expense. In Omaha, Nebr., a superstreet is being driven through the heart of the city at an estimated cost of $42 million, though an alternate route, around the town, would cost less than $15 million. (Local boosters expect to get the alternate route built, too, after the main drag is finished.) Several downtown interchanges with the expressway are planned. The largest will consume about 100 acres. Land purchases alone will cost an estimated $10 million. Some 900 buildings, mostly homes, will be destroyed, and their occupants will be forced to find new places. Loss to the tax rolls will be heavy.

Why this costly local street at Uncle Sam's expense? "We've passed Chicago as a livestock center," one businessman explains, "and we should have good roads leading to the stockyards so that cattle and hogs can be delivered more easily."

That's fine for Omaha, but why should the other 49 States pay 90 percent of the bill?

Although only 12 percent of the interstate network mileage is slated to go into or around cities, at least 45 percent of the network money is being spent on urban roads such as Omaha's. On some of them more dollars go for land than for construction.

Take a look at what is happening in Wilmington, Del. Here bulldozers are driving a 300-foot swath right through town. The six-lane highway will cost $62,432,000—$5 million a mile—and cut the town in two. More than 600 homes are in the path, plus some 50 business buildings, churches and theaters. Their destruction means a tax loss of $115,000 a year. The city council calls the project a "wasteful, ruinous folly" and demands a congressional investigation. A taxpayer's suit, about to be decided, seeks to halt the work. Meanwhile, the job is going ahead, despite the fact that a route that would skirt the town and cost $17 million less is available. (Much the same situation exists in El Paso, Tex.)

In Macon, Ga., the projected 4½-mile road through the center of town will bisect an attractive residential district containing 28 churches and 17 schools. It will eliminate 400 homes, including some of the city's most substantial, and will fence off the 89-year-old campus of Mercer University from the only direction in which it can grow. It will produce 28 dead-end streets. It ignores the traffic needs of nearby Robins airbase, and will be a headache for long-distance drivers. A city-county planning board report calls it "blight-producing."

Angry citizens have pointed out the very obvious advantages of a route around town. The present chairman of county commissioners has replied that Macon should not "pass up an outlay of $50 million that is going to be dumped in our laps." By coincidence, a former chairman of county commissioners who, with several other officials, approved a similar layout in 1955 and has been pushing for its adoption, owns a number of acres of land at strategic spots along the right of way.

True, the law creating the national network says that "local needs shall be given equal consideration with the needs of interstate commerce." But too many cities are giving all consideration to their own needs. Their chambers of commerce, politicians, business groups, real-estate operators, and fast-buck manipulators feel that an extra highway never hurt any community. Anyway, a new road means profitable business for contractors, splendid real-estate deals, work for deserving labor, and quantities of cement, asphalt, gravel, and steel to be bought from manufacturers and local dealers always willing and anxious to serve.

THE RUSH FOR THE BIG MONEY

The second trouble with the program is that because of the rush to get at the Federal moneybags, the mismanagement and waste normal to a program so sprawling and vast have been many times multiplied.

For example, the argument that sold the highway network to even the most economy-minded Congressmen was that it was a military necessity. The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 stated: "Because of the primary importance to the national defense, the name of such a system is hereby changed to the 'National System of Interstate and Defense Highways.'" Its proponents claim that it will bolster the national defense by assuring swift movement of materiel and troops in moments of peril.

Yet during the first 4 years of construction, at an expense of hundreds of millions of dollars, more than 2,000 bridges and underpasses have been built that are too small to permit passage of some of our most important weapons. How can such things be?

In July 1956, the Secretary of Commerce and a committee of State highway officials—with no representatives from the Department of Defense—decided that a 14-foot minimum clearance all along the network would be fine. A telephone call to the Pentagon would have disclosed their error. For our military inventories even then included missiles and radar equipment that could not possibly squeeze under an opening 14 feet high, and larger implements were on the drawing boards.

Two and a half years later, after millions of dollars' worth of concrete and steel had been solidly built into the structures, the military planners at the Pentagon announced that a clearance of 17 feet was necessary.

Did Federal highway officials order work halted until new dimensions could be agreed upon? Not at all. They and the Pentagon brass sat down for a series of "informal discussions" that lasted from January into October. Meanwhile, the money flooded out across the country, and the builders continued to throw obstructions across the "military highways."

Not until January 1960 was a compromise dimension finally decided on. The clearance would be not the 17 feet that the Army and Air Force needed, but 16 feet—not quite enough for the largest weapons. There was one advantage: the necessary reconstruction of inadequate underpasses and bridges already built would cost, as one Western builder put it, "only $730 million."

With such haste, many items—and many dollars—get out of control. In New York, for example, the U.S. Comptroller General discovered that an estimate calling for $25 million to buy up 35 miles of roadway had been decided on in less than a day. In Georgia, an estimate was overstated by $19,700,000—the result of faulty arithmetic. In Ohio, an error of $9 million was made because of a typographical mistake.

Federal policy requires that land must be appraised before it can be purchased by the State. But many parcels of land have been bought first and appraised later. In Nevada alone, the Comptroller General's Office found what it chose to call deficiencies in the purchase of 29 out of 40 pieces of land. Typical was "parcel No. 3, project IN-001-1 (14)." This property was bought on April 26, 1957, for $42,000. On that same day appraisers employed by the State listed the value of the parcel at only $22,000. Having spent almost double the appraised valuation, the State quickly put another appraiser to work. Even he could stretch the valuation to only $38,000—$4,000 less than had already been paid. The files of the Comptroller General are full of such examples.

Mismanagement is evident, too, in the extravagant use of private engineering consultants, instead of State highway employees, in designing projects. Such practice is in violation of Federal policy, and it runs into money. The General Accounting Office has found that the costs of Pennsylvania's contracts with private consultants for preliminary engineering alone have been averaging $1 million a month. In New Jersey, in less than 4 years, eight engineering firms have received $8,219,967 in consultant fees for interstate projects. In Maryland, consultants have received more than $24 million on federally aided highways since 1954.

Usually a consultant is paid a percentage of the cost of the project on which he works. He has a great deal to do with deciding whether the job will be an expensive one or a frugal one. Thus only a highly developed sense of ethics stands between him and temptation. While rich old Uncle is tossing money around, the temptation to cash in on a large scale is frequently great and sometimes irresistible.

HUSH-HUSH DEALS

With hasty mismanagement and local greed has come, inevitably, a third drain—collusion, chicanery, venality, and graft. Nobody knows the enormity of the take to date, but more and more cases are coming to light.

In Indiana, for example, the national president, a vice president, and the treasurer of the Carpenters' Union have been investigated by a grand jury for having bought property near Gary, after being tipped off that a road was going through, and then selling the property for a quick profit of $78,000. The union officers were charged with having paid off a State highway official. The indictments were made in February 1958, but the men were not arraigned until May 1960.

In Oklahoma, on one 13-mile, $8 million bypass at Tulsa, grand jury and congressional probes have recently turned up evidence that one contractor, with the knowledge and assistance of State highway engineers and inspectors, used substandard materials, falsified delivery weights, and padded bills. Highway department employees testified that, on orders from their superiors, they actually made up samples of materials in a laboratory, instead of taking them from the roadbed, as "proof" that specifications were met. Federal overseers of the job discovered nothing amiss at any time. Others testified that overpayments to this one contractor are estimated at $524,000, and that the road, completed in 1958, is already starting to crack up in places.

In Nevada, the interstate road from the California line eastward, as officially planned, will shoulder its way right through the heart of Reno. To do this it will have to bridge the Truckee River four times, plus a ravine 125 feet deep. It will cost an estimated $41 million. An alternate route, for which 17,000 Reno citizens have signed a petition, would bypass the city only 17 blocks to the north, need no bridges, and cost at least $23 million less.

Reno's row over these two routes drew the attention of Nevada's lone U.S. Congressman, WALTER S. BARING, who last year forced the mess into the open. Investigation showed there had been no survey of the bypass before local hearings were held, and that cost estimates for right-of-way on the officially favored downtown route had been $5,600,000 too low. In a letter to President Eisenhower, BARING angrily declared that if the plan for a midtown route was permitted to go forward it would result in the biggest swindle ever perpetrated in the State of Nevada. He still had received no assurance in mid-May that construction of the route would not proceed as planned.

Meanwhile, BARING has continued to ask questions, not only about Reno but about the whole interstate program. He points the finger at "expensive real estate deals" and "tremendously high administrative costs," and he is urging his fellow Congressmen to "clean house."

Scandals are stirring in at least six other States, and investigations now in progress are likely to uncover chicanery on a large scale before many more months have passed.

One other Member of Congress, Minnesota Democrat JOHN A. BLATNIK, heads a subcommittee that is digging deeply into the whole highway situation. With nearly $300,000 voted for the investigation, BLATNIK has put to work several of the toughest investigators who in recent years unearthed pay dirt for the McClellan labor-management corruption committee. The Blatnik committee is already finding substance in the charges of Virginia's Senator HARRY BYRD that the road program is in an "inexcusable mess," and that there has been great "temptation to grab land, hike prices and profiteer."

When the committee's reports are released, efforts undoubtedly will be made to convince the public that the charges are political. But neither major party seems more guilty than the other. State and local administrations of both political hues have been reckless of public responsibility, have used roads and real estate to further their individual designs. And the Federal Bureau of Public Roads has been inept.

Some will undoubtedly urge that we proceed full speed ahead, "for the good of the Nation." But perhaps it is time not to go ahead. Judging by the record to date, it is time to stop and evaluate, to make every possible effort to cut out the waste, graft and stupidity, if that beautiful dream we all once had is to come true.

Let every citizen who has specific evidence of tax dollars going down the highway program's multibillion-dollar rathole report that evidence to Congressman JOHN BLATNIK now. Let us have honest value for our tax money.

Mr. HRUSKA. The questions which are raised in the article should disturb all taxpayers who are concerned about the conduct of their public affairs. Certainly, the charges warrant close scrutiny.

America has invested, and will continue to invest, immense sums of money in highway programs. These great ribbons of concrete signify convenient, quick travel between the great cities of our country. In a word, they spell progress and insure even greater prosperity for our people. The continued well-being of our country is tied to such public projects. This job, on which our military defenses depend so much, must be done properly and as economically as possible.

We are understandably concerned when reports are made that this program is being bungled. When complaints of this sort are received, prompt and thorough investigation is in order.

In this connection, however, it is appropriate to mention that not every complaint necessarily proves to be well founded; and, certainly, while we proceed to make an investigation, let us not lose sight of the impelling reasons which brought Congress to enact the highway program "for the common defense and general welfare."

To this end, I invited Mr. Ellis Armstrong, Commissioner of Public Roads, to comment upon the Reader's Digest article. Since many of my colleagues are no doubt receiving letters of the same nature, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Armstrong's letter and analysis or commentary be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and the analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FEDERAL HIGHWAY ADMINISTRATOR,
Washington, D.C., June 30, 1960.

HON. ROMAN L. HRUSKA,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HRUSKA: In response to a telephoned request from your office today, I am enclosing an analysis by the Bureau of Public Roads of certain points raised in an article in the July Reader's Digest entitled "Our Great Big Highway Bungle."

You will notice that the Omaha situation is dealt with in considerable detail as are the other urban route questions referred to in the article.

I appreciate your interest in this matter and I'm sure you are well aware from your close observation of the Federal-aid highway program that there is another side to the story presented in this publication.

Sincerely yours,

ELLIS L. ARMSTRONG,
Commissioner of Public Roads.

ANALYSIS BY U.S. BUREAU OF PUBLIC ROADS OF JULY READER'S DIGEST ARTICLE ON INTERSTATE HIGHWAY PROGRAM

The Reader's Digest for July contains an article by Karl Detzer, entitled "Our Great Big Highway Bungle," that criticizes the 41,000-mile Interstate and Defense Highway program, which the Federal Government is building in cooperation with the States.

The following analysis of various charges is presented, together with the actual facts in each case, for the purpose of correcting errors and providing pertinent facts omitted in the magazine article:

"ANALYSIS

"Page 45–46: 'While the entire (interstate) network was originally scheduled to cost $27 billion, the Bureau of Public Roads had to admit within 2 years that "unexpected additional costs" had already arisen. The official figure was quietly raised to just under $40 billion. Yet today even this figure is entirely misleading. For one thing, it ignores the proposed $5 billion reimbursement to the States for their previously built toll roads and turnpikes that have been incorporated into the system. For another, it does not recognize a little matter of a billion and a half dollars as the cost of relocating public utilities and railroads that lie in the path of the new roads.'

"Facts: The original estimate referred to by the author was for $27.5 billion, including $25 billion Federal and $2.5 billion of State funds. It was made by the State highway departments in 1954 as part of an overall highway needs estimate pursuant to a directive of the Congress. Only 6 weeks time was available for the preparation of the estimate.

"The estimate submitted to the Congress in 1958 was made during 1957. It was far more precise, thorough and, in fact, the first real estimate of the cost of completing the Interstate System. It required a million man-hours to produce.

"The official figure was not quietly raised. It was duly reported to Congress in January 1958. It was the subject of extensive testimony before the appropriate congressional committees. It was reported by the newspapers and wire services. The reasons for the increase in the 1958 estimate over the original estimate were fully stated in House Document No. 300, 85th Congress, 2d session.

"In brief, they were:

"1. The nationwide traffic forecasts for 1975 which were made subsequent to the 1956 act resulted in a need for more traffic lanes and other facilities than had been contemplated in the original estimate.

"2. The 1956 act changed the previous concept of the functions of the Interstate System, requiring that 'local needs, to the extent practicable, suitable, and feasible' be given equal consideration with the needs of interstate commerce. This revised concept required more highway grade separations, interchanges, other structures, and frontage roads.

"3. Miscellaneous items not included in the original estimate were calculated as part of the estimate presented in 1958. These were utility relocations, uniform signing of the Interstate System throughout the United States in accordance with modern freeway standards, lighting and delineation.

"4. General highway construction costs of the Interstate System type rose 12 percent during the interval between the two estimates.

"Both the 1955 and 1958 estimates contemplated the inclusion of certain toll roads and free roads in the Interstate System. However, no legislation has yet been enacted to provide for reimbursing the States for the cost of these highways.

"As to the cost of relocating utilities, the $1.5 billion figure used by the author is a guess. The 1958 estimate included $400 million for this item for reimbursement under the laws then prevailing in the various States. Increased costs as a result of new laws enacted since that time have not been calculated but there is no evidence to conclude that the total would reach $1.5 billion.

"Page 46: 'A new official figure is due in January 1961. Already many engineers and builders privately estimate that $50 billion will not touch the total cost.'

"Fact: This is a gratuitous assumption. We have no reason to believe that the estimate to be submitted in 1961 will differ substantially from that presented in 1958.

"Page 46: 'The first trouble is that Uncle Sam is paying most of the bill, with little control written into the law. The Federal Government simply shovels out the money for the States to spend.'

"Fact: This implies that the Federal Government advances cash to the States. Actually, the procedure is one of reimbursement, after thorough audit by the Bureau of Public Roads and subject to check audits by the General Accounting Office, of expenditures made initially by the States. The reimbursement is limited to the Federal share of that portion of the disbursements which are found by Federal audit to have been proper and necessary. Any item not so approved is paid for by the State.

"Laws, regulations, and prescribed operating procedures which the States must follow in the construction of interstate and other Federal-aid highway facilities provide for review and approval by the Federal Government at every stage of project advancement, and for a detailed audit of all costs prior to any final payment of Federal funds.

"Page 46: 'Federal engineers help draw a rough, overall map of the system and set minimum—but not maximum—standards. From there on the States take over. They decide how much money they need, how much right-of-way to buy, where and at what price. They decide on the type of paving, how thick the surface shall be, on how much of what kind of base to pour it, and what types of bridges to build. They let their own contracts.'

"Facts: Inasmuch as the author fails to define what he means by standards, it is difficult to reply to the first part of his statement. Some standards are rigid, for example, those for design of highway bridges. The standards specify that bridges shall be designed to support a definite, prescribed loading—no more, no less.

"There are many geometric features for which there are no maximum standards, and for good reason. It must be recognized that the standards must apply in all States to innumerable individual situations. It must also be recognized that there are vast differences in topography, in climatic conditions, in soil conditions, in land values and in traffic conditions throughout the Nation. It would not be feasible to include within the framework of a single set of standards a complete specification of every design detail applicable to every mile of the system. Such is not the purpose of highway design standards. Rather, the purpose of geometric standards is to delineate the basic principle to govern each of the various controlling features of the design and then, within these limits, require the design engineer to exercise the skills and knowledge of his profession in planning a facility that best satisfies the needs of traffic at lowest cost in each of the varying situations as they exist.

"The State never takes over. Every step in the construction program from the preparation of preliminary plans to inspection of the finished job is supervised and approved by the Bureau of Public Roads.

"Each State draws up programs which it proposes to be built with Federal-aid funds based upon preliminary surveys and cost estimates. Since there is close contact between the Bureau's field offices and the State highway departments, most of the questions as to the selection of individual projects and their location, design, and cost are settled in the early planning stage.

"After Bureau of Public Roads approval, the State undertakes the preparation of detailed plans and specifications. It is at these stages, after the required public hearing and upon Bureau approval, that there is a complete meeting of minds between the Bureau and the State as to exactly what is to be built. The States then let the contracts by open competitive bidding under rigid Federal controls established by law.

"Page 46: 'Though Federal engineers are supposed to approve every yard of highway to make sure there has been no waste, the inspections are usually sketchy and infrequent.'

"Fact: Federal laws provide for the projects to be constructed under direct responsibility and supervision of the State highway departments but subject to inspection and approval by the Bureau. All Bureau inspections are thorough but their frequency depends largely on the conditions on each individual project. In general, inspections are made at least once a month when the construction is active. More frequent inspections are made as and when needed, particularly when there are special problems to consider.

"If the Bureau were to try to verify from firsthand knowledge that every detail of the construction is performed in absolute conformity with the plans and specifications, it would be necessary to have Bureau inspectors constantly observing and making tests on every phase of the work on every project, at each source of materials, and at each testing site.

"At any one time during the active construction season there have been since the highway program authorized by the 1956 act reached the full construction stage, several thousand (as many as 10,000) Federal-aid highway construction contracts in active status. As several different kinds of construction operations and testing procedures would generally be under way simultaneously at a number of different locations for each contract, a corresponding number of inspectors would be required on each of the thousands of contracts. The total numbers of such inspectors needed would be enormous probably requiring five or six times the present Bureau force. Furthermore, these efforts would duplicate those of the State engineers and inspectors on the same work, thus creating a situation both unsound from a management standpoint and unjustifiably wasteful of public funds.

"Pages 46–47: The article states that three expensive interchanges were built on a 3-mile stretch of interstate highway in a sparsely settled area in Nevada, and implies that under such circumstances there was no justification for this type of construction.

"Facts: In evaluating this situation it must be realized that the interstate highway under question was being constructed along the alinement of the old highway. Full engineering and economic study of alternate routings established that this location was the only practicable one. The access points in question were provided where previous access was provided to the old highway.

"Where a freeway is located on existing alinement there is inherently involved the problem of handling access rights which have existed for the old highway. In gaining the economy of utilizing the existing location and in providing for the continued local service which the old highway rendered, the added problem of either providing frequent interchanges or constructing frontage roads is encountered if access is to be fully controlled, or direct access and crossings at grade must be permitted. All alternate methods of construction were considered in this case, and a decision was made to provide for interchanges as the most economical method.

"The location of this Nevada highway is in rugged topography, where suitable vertical and horizontal alinement could be obtained without excessive construction costs only by following the course of the Truckee River. A railroad also parallels the river and highway through this section. With the river, the railroad and the highway occupying the extremely limited usable area in this river canyon, frontage roads that would have been needed to connect the local roads to a single interchange could not be built as economically as the structures mentioned in the article. One of the interchange structures cost $62,500, another cost $68,800, and the third, $89,700, for a total of $221,000. From this must be deducted costs for roadway items, ramps, surfacing, engineering, etc., which would have been required for any alternate acceptable design. The implied excess cost of $358,000 therefore is misleading and inaccurate.

"Page 47: The article alleges duplication of existing highways and says that the General Accounting Office, in a study of only 11 States, found 8 planning new highways 'shoulder to shoulder' with existing toll roads.

"Facts: The Department of Commerce has a fixed policy regarding approval of new free highway construction parallel to existing toll roads. It depends on two major considerations: First, whether the existing toll facility will be adequate to accommodate all of the traffic forecast for 1975, and second, whether construction of any needed additional free facility to accommodate the volume excess to the toll road will jeopardize the financial structure of the existing toll facility. No facilities have been or will be built in duplication of a toll road or bridge which can accommodate the traffic need.

"Pages 47–48 and 50–51: The author cites Omaha, Nebr., Wilmington, Del., Macon, Ga., and Reno, Nev., as examples of the 'building of city roads at Uncle Sam's expense' and indicates that bypass routes should have been chosen.

"Facts: This ignores two basic principles of highway location: (1) Highways must be constructed where the traffic wants to go, and (2) long-range cost, including cost to the user, must be considered as well as initial cost.

"Omaha: To the extent possible, consistent with present and future land uses, neighborhoods, physical barriers, and comparative costs, the Omaha freeway locations were developed so as to serve the major desire lines of traffic. For cities the size of Omaha, about 20 percent of approaching traffic is generally destined for the central business district, 70 percent is destined for other points within the city, and the remaining 10 percent is going to points beyond the city. The detailed studies made clear that Omaha will need a bypass route, but they also showed that there was a greater and earlier need for an internal freeway route.

"To effectively serve the present and future traffic needs between Council Bluffs and Omaha, the internal interstate highway was located to skirt downtown Omaha and provide a needed additional river crossing. A bypass route would do almost nothing to relieve these major traffic bottlenecks within and between the two cities. Downtown interchanges being planned in Omaha (two) are very limited to minimize property acquisition.

"Wilmington: The article says a 300-foot swath will be cut through the city. In the downtown area the proposed design puts part of the line on viaduct, requiring right-of-way less than half that width. The bulk of the remainder is in a depressed section between Jackson and Adams Streets. Here the entire block is taken to permit retention of those two streets to serve as frontage roads and permit the construction of a facility which will be both functional and otherwise acceptable.

"The article also points out that an alternate routing skirting the city could be built for $17 million less. It is presumed that this refers to a bypass on the west side of the city, since an eastern bypass is now in the planning stage. A study of traffic usage of the several routes shows that such a west bypass would serve only about one-third the number of users that can be served by the approved city line, and, therefore, it would do little to help the internal traffic situation in Wilmington.

"Macon: Since the 1947 designation of the Interstate System, the interstate highway between Atlanta, Ga., and Lake City, Fla., was located to pass through the city of Macon, where it connected with another designated route running southeasterly to Savannah. In 1955, when additional urban-area routes were considered on a nationwide basis, the Georgia State Highway Department recommended the addition of a bypass on the west side of Macon for the north-south traffic. The Bureau approved this route.

"The previous decisions on the Macon area routes were based on detailed studies of a major street and highway plan for the city developed in 1947, and a similar survey made in 1953–54. The routes were endorsed by the public officials of both Bibb County and the city of Macon. Six different locations were considered and the studies heretofore made showed that the ones selected would serve considerably more traffic than the alternates, with estimated annual vehicle operating cost savings of about $3 million calculated on a very conservative basis. This saving would be equal to the capital investment in about 14 years.

"At hearings held by the State on February 17, 1960, objections were voiced on the internal routes. Accordingly, the State is now making further studies of alternate locations as to each of these routes. These route locations are mutually dependent, and the further studies are being undertaken to determine whether the present general locations are best designed to meet the interstate needs and the overall solution to the transportation problem in the Macon area.

"Certain preliminary engineering has been performed as to each of these routes in the vicinity of Macon but no right-of-way has been purchased under any of these projects and no work is in progress now.

"Reno: Five alternate locations for a route in the Reno area, together with several variations, were studied by consultants and still another location was independently studied by the Bureau. Also, the matter was investigated and reported on by a special subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations. The subcommittee concluded after hearing testimony from State and Bureau officials as well as proponents of other routes that while the initial cost of the selected route is higher than the bypass route, initial cost alone is not the proper or decisive criterion.

"It pointed out that selection of the route is a compromise that followed local opposition to all other downtown routes equally feasible from a cost and engineering standpoint. With regard to bypassing Reno, the subcommittee's report states that while the selection of a downtown location for an interstate highway is admittedly an exception to the general rule of the desirability of a bypass route for communities of comparable size, the unique characteristics of Reno as a tourist attraction and stopping-off place and the results of local traffic surveys make the selection of a downtown route a plausible one.

"The article, in speaking of a $23 million saving by bypassing the city to the north, has obviously considered only the initial costs and not the traffic to be served and the benefits to be afforded to the road users. The road-user benefits on the downtown route were reported at $3 million annually while the bypass route benefits were $405,000 annually.

"Page 47: 'Although only 12 percent of the interstate network mileage is slated to go into or around cities, at least 45 percent of the network money is being spent on urban roads. * * * On some of them more dollars go for land than for construction.'

"Facts: This requires explanation. The first estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System, made in compliance with section 108(d) of the 1956 Highway Act and submitted to the Congress in January 1958, indicated that 11 percent of the interstate highway mileage was located in urban areas, and 42 percent of the total cost of the Interstate System reflected by this estimate would occur in urban areas. Studies, involving both costs and revenue, indicate the cost of highway construction in urban areas is in balance with the highway revenues produced for the trust fund in these same areas. As a matter of fact, all proposals since the interstate program was first contemplated have indicated that about half of the cost would be in urban areas.

"A review of the details of this same estimate (sec. 108(d) estimate), and the construction cost experience and right-of-way cost experience since the time the program was started, indicate that 28 percent of the total cost of the highway facility in urban areas is for the purchase of right-of-way. During the 3½-year period on which construction cost experience is available under this program, construction cost in urban areas approximates $1.6 million per mile, and the cost of right of way approximates $0.7 million per mile or about 30 percent. It would be a rare case over a very short distance where right-of-way costs would exceed construction costs through the same area.

"Pages 48–49: The author makes a number of allegations as to lack of coordination between the Departments of Commerce and Defense on the question of height of vertical clearance of structures over the Interstate System.

"Facts: There has been continuous coordination between the Bureau of Public Roads and the Department of Defense, dating back to 1922, when the Bureau was just starting to approve routes on the Federal-aid system.

"Through the years and especially during World War II, there was a coordinated effort to keep design limitations of military vehicles and minimum design standards of highways in balance.

"After the war, in response to a request made by the Bureau of Public Roads, the Department of Defense advised on December 29, 1948, that the maximum height of general purpose and special equipment vehicles would not exceed 12.5 feet. This was confirmed on March 11, 1949, by the report from the Department of Defense to Congress on June 30, 1949, entitled "Highway Needs of the National Defense" (House Document No. 249, 81st Congress, 1st session).

"During the period 1949 through 1957 cooperative liaison activities were continued concerning minimum highway standards and vehicle limitations, but no problems were identified with respect to vertical clearances. There was participation by the representatives of the Defense Department in adoption of the standards for the Interstate System.

"On October 1, 1957, the Department of Defense, after receiving reports from the Department of the Army, Navy, and Air Force advised Public Roads that the approved design standards for the Interstate System, including the minimum vertical clearance of 14 feet, were adequate for anticipated equipment and material of the Department of Defense agencies.

"It should be pointed out that no one knew at that time how big missiles would be by 1975 and it is doubtful if anyone knows now. It was known that some defense items, including missiles, would not clear a 14-foot structure over the Interstate System. But the increased cost of the System by reason of the increased vertical clearance had to be considered in the light of the infrequency of such outsize movements.

"Thus, under date of March 9, 1960, Mr. Perkins McGuire, Assistant Secretary of Defense, advised Senator HUMPHREY that as of October 1, 1957, "it was clearly understood by the military departments, the States and the Bureau of Public Roads that some of the military items of equipment exceed 14 feet when loaded on available highway vehicles. But no one believed there was sufficient justification to request changing the vertical clearance standard and increasing further the cost of the Interstate System.

"Because of dramatic developments in space vehicles, the Department of Defense began another review of its requirements in March 1958. During the rest of 1958 the Department of Defense was studying the problem, and was furnished several estimates of the increase in cost to obtain specified vertical clearances on the Interstate System.

"No decision has been made with respect to structures already built, but the availability of alternate routes will eliminate the need for altering many, perhaps the majority. If all existing structures authorized by Public Roads between July 1, 1956, and January 27, 1960, the date of approval of the 16-foot clearance, were reconstructed the cost would be $176 million, not the $730 million figure referred to in the article.

"Page 49: With such haste, many items—and many dollars—get out of control. In New York, for example, the U.S. Comptroller General discovered that an estimate calling for $25 million to buy up 35 miles of roadway had been decided on in less than a day.

"Fact: On this point, the American Association of State Highway Officials replied as follows:

" 'Approximately 25 percent of this mileage was in an area where right-of-way appraisers were actually acquiring right-of-way for an interstate route and they were thoroughly familiar with values. The remainder of the route was in open country consisting of large estates or farms where the right-of-way could be estimated in large blocks. The time involved is sufficient for a well-informed rights-of-way team to make their appraisals. On another section of highway the route had been evaluated in detail in 1954. Our acquisition experience had indicated a general rise in values in that area during the intervening time, and the 1954 estimate was revised to reflect that increase'

"Page 49: In Georgia, an estimate was overstated by $19,700,000—the result of faulty arithmetic. In Ohio, an error of $9 million was made because of a typographical mistake.

"Facts: These errors are made to appear as representing an improper use of public moneys rather than being recognized for what they are; namely, a part of a preliminary engineering estimate of the cost of completing a national highway system. They are self-correcting in that there are several subsequent reestimates of the needs of the system such as the one now under way in accordance with the law. These estimates are not a precise accounting of costs as one would expect to find on a balance sheet, but are rather an advance forecast of costs based on preliminary plan data in order to provide an apportionment factor for distribution to the States on the basis of relative need of the funds necessary to complete the Interstate System simultaneously in all the States.

"The effect of errors cited here would be a negligible change in the apportionment factors for Georgia and Ohio during the 3-year period, fiscal years 1960, 1961, and 1962. Since the total estimate for Georgia was about $776 million, and for Ohio about $2,094 million, it can be seen that the effect of these errors in the States' apportionment factors would be small.

"Page 49: The article refers to deficiencies in right-of-way acquisition procedures in Nevada, and cites as a typical example 'Parcel No. 3, Project IN–001–1(14).'

"Facts: The article did not bother to point out that in 1957 the State was advised by the Bureau that Federal reimbursement could not be made for costs on this parcel on the basis of documentation then available. Additional documentation was subsequently provided by the State and reimbursement for the Federal share was made in a reduced amount fully supported by appraisal reports.

"The General Accounting Office report referred to in the article listed a number of criticisms of Nevada's land-acquisition practices on the basis of actions dating back to 1956. Improvements have since been made by the State, and corrective actions have been taken where necessary so that the practices and procedures criticized in the report have since been eliminated in current operations.

"Page 49: The article is critical of the 'extravagant' use of private engineering consultants instead of State highway department employees for the design of highway facilities, and refers to 'mismanagement' in this area.

"Facts: Federal highway legislation requires that each State shall have a State highway department suitably equipped and organized to discharge the duties required by the law, and regulations issued by the Secretary of Commerce provide for the use of consulting engineers by the State highway departments. A strong and capable State highway department is necessary to a well-designed highway system, whether the design of individual projects is done by State forces or by consulting engineers. Many of the States have made use of consulting engineering firms to accomplish design, and such practice has been very beneficial.

"The use of consulting engineers for specialized engineering design work has made available to highway departments experts in various phases of highway engineering, particularly in the design of urban facilities. It would have been impossible to obtain these otherwise, and even if possible, it would be an unwise expenditure to retain them constantly on the regular State rolls. Certainly the employment of consultants has served to expedite the progress of the Interstate program in many instances. As a matter of fact the accelerated program made possible by the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 could hardly have gotten off the ground without them.

"In initiating the interstate highway program it was essential that prompt progress be made in the preparation of engineering plans so that leadtime required for the orderly acquisition of right-of-way in advance of construction could be provided. The use of private engineering organizations to help the States build up this shelf of plans well ahead of their construction program resulted in more orderly and better right-of-way acquisition. The use of consulting engineers for some of the work gives the States greater flexibility; enables them to secure experts for specialized situations; brings outside thinking into solving problems; creates incentive for better production of the States' forces by providing a yardstick of accomplishment; and enables work to be accomplished that would be impossible otherwise. The objective has been to get the design work done as efficiently and effectively as possible.

"The use of consultants to get the expanded highway program under way has benefited the States and the Nation. The States have been able to acquire rights-of-way several years earlier and consequently cheaper than would have been possible under their own design organizations. Also, the earlier completion of interstate projects, with modern safety features, has resulted in tremendous savings in lives and in injury and property damage. Certainly these benefits exceed the monetary value of all the work discussed.

"Payments for work done by consultants are made on several different bases including lump sum, cost per mile, or percentage of actual or estimated cost of construction for which plans, specifications, and estimates are prepared. In all cases, the operating procedures prescribed protect the State and Federal Governments. Under these procedures there is no opportunity for consultants to enhance their fees through the expedient of extravagant designs. Plans developed by consultants must follow the same predetermined design standards as those developed by regular State highway department forces and must be reviewed and approved in the same manner.

"Page 50: The author refers to an old Indiana right-of-way scandal in which officials of the Carpenter's Union were indicted on charges of conspiracy to defraud the State.

"Facts: The article does not mention that Frank M. Chapman, the union official charged with making a quick profit of $78,802.80 on the sale of property to the State of Indiana, has repaid $78,416.29 to the State.

"The article also fails to point out that not a cent of Federal funds was paid on the projects involved in this case, which dates back to July and August 1956.

"Page 50: The article refers to the recent grand jury action taken by the county grand jury in Tulsa, Okla., against the construction contractor and includes reference to the congressional probe of the inspection practices followed during the construction of the Tulsa Bypass. It states that evidence was turned up that the contractor, with the knowledge and assistance of the State highway engineer's inspectors, used substandard materials, falsified delivery weights, and padded bills.

"Facts: The investigations conducted by the Bureau and the House Special Highway Subcommittee did disclose evidence of poor State procedures and laxity on the part of State inspectors during the construction of the project. However, there have been no charges of conspiracy made between the contractor and State employees as the article tends to convey.

"As a result of the testimony in this case the Bureau instituted new procedures providing, among other things, for random 'surprise' road samples to be taken from completed highways and tested by the States' central testing laboratory with the Bureau's engineers given the opportunity to observe the tests.

"The article cites the figure of $524,000 as the estimate of overpayment made to the contractor. This is the figure which was presented by the Curry Engineering Co. which performed the materials tests for the Tulsa County attorney and presented at the congressional hearing. The Bureau and the State are still conducting an examination of the highway and available records to determine the actual amount of the deficiency. The Bureau also notified the State of Oklahoma that Federal payments to the State would be withheld in the amount of the proved deficiency.

"While the article states the highway, although completed in 1958, is already starting to crack up in places, a very critical engineering examination of the main line of the highway revealed that there was no evidence of any marked distress in excess of that found on similar projects. It was noted, however, that on some sections of the service roads there was evidence of surface deterioration and cracking up.

"Page 51: 'Let every citizen who has specific evidence of tax dollars going down the highway programs' multibillion-dollar rathole report that evidence to Congressman JOHN A. BLATNIK now.'

"By all means let him report any such evidence to Representative BLATNIK. Let him also report it to the appropriate State highway department. Let him also report it to the Bureau of Public Roads, U.S. Department of Commerce, and to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, U.S. Department of Justice."

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oregon for yielding to me for this purpose.

CABLE ANTENNA TELEVISION SYSTEM

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me, with the understanding that in doing so he will not lose his right to the floor?

Mr. MORSE. Yes; and then I shall yield to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. MOSS. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. President, on the 31st day of May, I made some remarks, on the Senate floor, concerning the Senate's refusal to pass a bill relating to the cable antenna television system.

I have just received a communication from Jerrold Electronics Corp., of Philadelphia, Pa., requesting that I correct certain errors contained in my statement of May 31. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the letter I received from Jerrold Electronics Corp. be made a part of the RECORD immediately following these remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JERROLD ELECTRONICS CORP.,
Philadelphia, Pa., July 1, 1960.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MOSS: Since part of your speech in the May 31 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains information concerning Jerrold Electronics Corp. and its operations, I know that you would be fair and willing to correct a number of errors about our company and the activities of its officers and directors.

Jerrold Electronics Corp. owns and operates CATV systems in the following communities: Washington: Wenatchee, Walla Walla, Richland; Idaho: Pocatello; California: Ukiah; Arizona: Flagstaff; New Jersey: Ventnor, Margate; Alabama: Florence, Tuscumbia, Sheffield; Iowa: Dubuque.

Some officers and directors of Jerrold have a stock interest in the following CATV systems: Washington, Ellensburg; New Hampshire, Berlin; Mississippi, Tupelo.

No subsidiary of Jerrold Electronics Corp. nor any of its officers, directors or agents have any stock interest to my knowledge in any other CATV system.

The information contained at the bottom of the first column and at the top of the second column on page 11463 should be corrected accordingly.

Jerrold Electronics Corp. does own and operate Inland Microwave, which in turn owns and operates Valley Microwave Corp.

The nine CATV systems owned by Jerrold have approximately 32,000 subscribers. The three CATV systems in which Jerrold officers have a minority stock interest have approximately 6,000 subscribers. It may be correct to state that we are the largest operator of CATV systems in the United States, serving the largest number of subscribers, although there are contrary reports in the field at the present time.

I think you will agree that this in itself is an indication of the smallness of our entire industry, because we as the largest operator have fewer total number of subscribers in all of our systems than has the telephone company in a city, let us say, the size of Madison, Wis.

The figures that you quote as to the value of a CATV system generally estimated to be worth from $100 to $300 per subscriber are a rule of thumb sometimes used by estimators. These figures vary widely as in any business in accordance with cost of plant, operating expense, percentage of saturation, rates for service, etc., etc. There seems to be an opinion in many quarters that our business is a gold mine, and all that need be done is assay the gold. Some community antenna systems are, in fact, valueless; others are worth a good deal of money. In either case, substantial money has been put up by investors backing their judgment as to the genuine public desire for the service. The fact that there are many successful community antenna systems, you may be sure, is the result of a tremendous amount of work, sound management and intensive attention to the rendering of a quality service to the public by owners and managers throughout the country, as well as substantial investment of venture capital.

I would appreciate it very much if you would be kind enough to correct the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it relates to the activities of Jerrold Electronics Corp., and I hope on some future occasion to be able to discuss this important matter with you.

Respectfully yours,

JERROLD ELECTRONICS CORP.,
M. J. SHARP, President.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1961

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona, provided I may do so without losing my right to the floor.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives on House bill 12740, the supplemental appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its action on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 12740, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
July 2, 1960.

That the House concur in the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 16 to the bill (H.R. 12740) entitled "An Act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes";

That the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 14, and 17 to said bill; and

That the House concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment, insert: $5,225,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, with reference to House bill 12740, the House of Representatives has agreed to certain amendments, has disagreed with certain amendments, and has concurred in one amendment with an amendment. This action was taken on the floor of the House. There has been no conference on this bill as yet.

The Senate committee members have discussed the action of the House, and believe that a conference should be held.

Therefore, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to Senate Amendment No. 15, insist upon its amendments Nos. 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 14, 15, and 17, and request a conference with the House, and that the Presiding Officer appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. HILL, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GRANTS TO THE CONVALESCENT HOSPITAL OF WASHINGTON, D.C., INC.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1900, Senate bill 2979.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2979) to authorize the Administrator of General Services to make grants in cash and land to the Convalescent Hospital of Washington, D.C., Inc., for the purpose of enabling the corporation to establish a convalescent and chronic disease hospital in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Act entitled "An Act to provide for the establishment of a modern, adequate, and efficient hospital center in the District of Columbia, to authorize the making of grants for hospital facilities to private agencies in the District of Columbia, to provide a basis for repayment to the Government by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved August 7, 1946 (60 Stat. 896), as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 8. (a) For the purpose of enabling the Convalescent Hospital of Washington, District of Columbia, Incorporated, to construct and equip a convalescent and chronic disease hospital in the District of Columbia, the Administrator of General Services Administration is authorized to make grants in cash and land as provided in this section.

"(b) Upon the request of the corporation, the Administrator is authorized to make a grant to the corporation in an amount sufficient to enable it to construct and equip a convalescent and chronic disease hospital.

"(c) The provisions of the preceding sections of this Act shall not apply with respect to the convalescent and chronic disease hospital authorized by this section.

"(d) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill S. 2979 is to authorize General Services Administration to grant to the Convalescent Hospital, for the purpose of construction and equipping of a hospital for chronic and convalescent diseases, such sums as may be necessary.

The Hospital Advisory Council of the District of Columbia advised the subcommittee that, under the Hill-Burton standards, there is a need for 1,600 beds for chronic diseases. Presently, 150 beds are available for these purposes. The cost of the proposed 330-bed hospital is estimated to be $4,750,000, all of which it is proposed to be obtained from the GSA grant.

I ask unanimous consent that certain sections from the report on the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The purpose of the amendments is to remove from the bill, as introduced, references to the transfer of certain property which is no longer available for transfer according to advice received from the General Services Administration.

The bill, if enacted, would amend the Hospital Center Act to authorize the Administrator of General Services Administration, upon request of the Convalescent Hospital of Washington, District of Columbia, Inc., a corporation organized exclusively for charitable, scientific, and educational purposes as a not-for-profit corporation, to make grants in cash in amounts sufficient to enable the corporation to construct and equip a 330-bed hospital for convalescents and those suffering from chronic diseases. Such sums as are necessary to accomplish this purpose are authorized to be appropriated.

The new section 8 added to the Hospital Center Act would not have applied to it the provisions of the preceding sections.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have indicated by report to the committee that since the District of Columbia has no responsibility for providing either the site or the necessary funds for the construction of the facility they have no objection to enactment. The Administrator of the General Services Administration by letter dated June 21, 1960, opposed the enactment of the bill on the basis that the land described in the bill as introduced had been transferred to the Hospital Center under authority of other legislation on March 1, 1960. It is the belief of the committee that the amendments adopted to the bill, deleting reference to the property upon which the proposed facility is to be built, have dealt with the basis of this objection. It was noted that the General Services Administration has no comment to make with regard to the need for the type of hospital facilities proposed.

Need for the facility was evidenced by a letter dated June 24, 1960, from the chairman, Hospital Advisory Council, which is made herewith a part of the report:

* * * * *

The Hospital Advisory Council of the District of Columbia has studied the need for chronic disease and other hospital beds in the District of Columbia and the surrounding metropolitan area. When the standard of two beds for each 1,000 population under the Hill-Burton program is applied to the District of Columbia, it is found that the District requires approximately 1,600 beds for chronic illnesses. Of this number, approximately 150 beds are available.

The hospital advisory council is aware of the great need for beds in this category and offers top priority to any sponsor of such a facility.

With respect to the specific project proposed under S. 2979, the council adopted a resolution to the effect that the proposed project for a 333-bed chronic, convalescent, and nursing home institution would contribute to meeting the substantial needs of the District of Columbia for facilities for these types of patients.

* * * * *

Written communications of support for the proposal were received from the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, the District of Columbia Chapter No. 1 of the National Association of Retired Civil Employees, a member of the District of Columbia Division of the American Cancer Society, a member of the Medical Advisory Board and Board of Directors of the Arthritis and Rheumatism Association of Metropolitan Washington, Inc., and from members of the public.

No testimony was given in opposition to the bill.

The cost of the 330-bed facility was estimated by its proponents to be approximately $4,750,000. General Services Administration advised the committee that the nature of the proposal is such as to make impossible at the present time any firm estimate of the probable cost.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the bill came to the Senate by unanimous vote of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and has been approved for consideration at this time by the leaders on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to authorize the Administrator of General Services Administration to make grants in cash to the Convalescent Hospital of Washington, District of Columbia, Incorporated, to establish a convalescent and chronic disease hospital in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRESS ON ELIMINATION OF WASTE IN MILITARY PROCUREMENT

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared on the subject of "Progress on Elimination of Waste in Military Procurement."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CURTIS—PROGRESS ON ELIMINATION OF WASTE IN MILITARY PROCUREMENT

As printed in the RECORD on July 25, 1955, I expressed my concern about reported instances of great waste and unnecessary cost in the military field. From a practical standpoint, we all know that it is a tremendous task to cut out all waste when such enormous quantities and varieties of supplies are being purchased every day for the defense of our country. Isolated cases are being played up in the press and are being discussed on the floor of the Senate.

During the past 5 years, I have been watching the progress being made by increasing our military efficiency and savings in cost through the continuous effort of the standardization program of the Department of Defense. I have personally discussed some of the aspects of this work with representatives of the Government personnel directly engaged in this work and have seen the results they are getting. I have also discussed the progress of this program with Dr. Carl L. Frederick a distinguished Nebraskan, now of Wheaton, Md., whom I mentioned in my statement in this RECORD 5 years ago. Dr. Frederick is president and principal scientist of the Frederick Research Corp. which has been serving the military agencies continuously in this field of evaluation and elimination of waste in military procurement for over 10 years. In 1955, I stated that the Air Force net savings, as a result of this work, was running into hundreds of millions of dollars. With that start the Air Force decided to handle further work in-house by parcelling it out to its various air materiel areas (AMAs). However, the Navy Bureau of Ordnance, Bureau of Aeronautics, and the Army Signal Corps immediately engaged the Frederick Research Corp. to carry out this same type of work with the result that savings of many million of dollars were realized by the military agencies.

In its broadest implications, the concept of standardization is important not only from the viewpoint of increased efficiency and effectiveness in the use of test equipment, but also from the economics inherent in the reduction of the total number of items required to support prime military activities and weapon systems.

The standardization program, as originally conceived, was to provide for the simplification and technical analysis to specific items needed by the military agencies. This approach has been effective in saving money, time, materials, and in introducing greater orderliness in logistical supply systems.

As examples of what is being accomplished in this area, I would like to call to your attention several programs conducted by the U.S. Army Signal Equipment Support Agency at Fort Monmouth, the Bureau of Weapons, and the Bureau of Ships. These programs are cited to demonstrate that the DOD and the Military Establishment are not only concerned witht military preparedness, but also with supporting military activities efficiently and economically.

It is reassuring to note that continuous effort is being directed by the Department of Defense and the military agencies through private research organizations like Frederick Research Corp. to constantly evaluate the number, type, and cost of equipments used by the military services from a completely objective viewpoint. The result is surprising when it is considered that the American taxpayer and the military agencies benefit by a reduction of inventories of whole items, decrease of supply and maintenance time and functions, and by the saving of many engineering man-hours. For, if no prior evaluation has been made, it is necessary that military support personnel accumulate sufficient data for making engineering decisions to reduce costs without sacrificing quality for national defense.

I have studied a copy of the final report of the study conducted by the Frederick Research Corp. for the Signal Corps on Federal Supply Class (FSC) 6625 which includes all electrical and electronic measuring and testing instruments used by all agencies of the Department of Defense.

I noted that the first immediate benefit was the recommendation to eliminate unnecessary items in Federal Supply Class No. 6625. When the program began, 43,709 items were in the Federal inventory in this class. It was found that 16,662 items were not items that belonged in test and measuring instruments. This left 27,047 items properly classified. After a thorough study, it was found that 7,987 items were all that were needed as standard items to perform all the test functions required by the Department of Defense. Thus, the reduced inventory, maintenance, and procurement activities implicit in this reduction can easily accrue savings in the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

As a result of the technical design study carried out by Frederick Research Corp., it was shown that many good, reliable, lower cost items can satisfy the military requirements rather than more expensive items now being carried in the Government inventory. For example, one test item costing $133 was found to replace another test item costing $650 for its important and most frequently used test functions.

As the records of military units using FSC 6625 instruments over the next few years become available, factors which presently cannot be assigned dollar values can easily be transformed to cash savings. These factors include savings resulting from reductions in stockroom space, supply personnel, number of whole items and parts procurement, maintenance costs, cataloging efforts, and in the speedup of logistic functions.

In the overall equipment complement required for support of DOD systems, this study reduced the number of items required by 22,521. For the most part, these equipments have been developed in the past 10 years. A very conservative estimate of the savings, to be realized through carrying out the contractor's recommendations, in the next 5-year period, can be obtained by assuming a linear expansion rate for the number of equipments required during this period rather than the anticipated exponential expansion rate. On this basis, the projected savings for the next 5-year period could well exceed several hundred million dollars.

The benefits of standardization need not always be talked about in terms of equipments, parts, inventories, and similar factors. Some of the most important savings are in terms of time spent performing engineering functions. Whenever engineering time is saved—money is saved. This point is very adequately demonstrated by the results of another program carried out by the Frederick Research Corp. for the Navy Bureau of Weapons.

Standardization documentation provides evaluated technical data on each item of equipment in any particular supply system. When engineers know exactly what they have to work with and how good it is compared to other similar items, many unneeded design procurements are prevented.

Another endeavor to cut military costs which I would like to mention is currently in process by Frederick Research Corp. under the direction of the Bureau of Ships. The objective of this program is to determine the measurement parameters of electronic test equipment required for the performance of corrective and preventive maintenance, and operational readiness of shipboard electronic prime equipments. On the basis of this, and other similar studies, the Bureau of Ships will be aided in the selection of the proper test equipment for each prime system and the selection of a minimum number of equipments with maximum utility. Since the program is not completed, precise dollar values cannot now be assigned to the results of this particular standardization effort. However, the potential savings involved in the reduction of inventories, procurements, engineering time, supply and administrative functions are implicit in the effort.

I would like to call to your attention an article appearing in the Wall Street Journal on June 30, 1960, which shows that as a further result of the forward steps being taken by this administration, many large manufacturing firms are realizing tremendous savings in the cost of goods sold to the Department of Defense. A figure of more than $4 billion is suggested as the value of these savings by manufacturers through standardization.

I hope I have demonstrated that while some inefficiencies are rightly brought to our attention, many programs have been and are being conducted whose objectives are to increase the effectiveness of our military activities, and in so doing are also accomplishing savings of American taxpayer dollars. I again want to commend the DOD, the military departments, and private organizations like the Frederick Research Corp., for their continued efforts in the field of standardization.

AWARD OF HONORARY DEGREE TO LEWIS M. HERRMANN

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, recently awarded an honorary degree to Lewis M. Herrmann, editor of the New Jersey Herald and Leader in the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, AFL. The award was certainly a well deserved one, because Dr. Herrmann has contributed much to the labor movement and to the State in which he resides and works.

A news release, distributed by the Institute of Management and Labor Relations to the Labor Press of the Nation, tells much about Dr. Herrmann, and it includes some expressions of esteem for Dr. Herrmann.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this press release printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW BRUNSWICK, June 15.—Rutgers University honored one of New Jersey's top labor figures at its 194th commencement here last week. Lewis M. Herrmann, editor of the New Jersey Labor Herald and leader in the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, AFL, received an honorary doctor of humane letters degree.

In conferring the degree, State University President Mason W. Gross referred to Dr. Herrmann as an educator, trade unionist and labor statesman.

"Your half century of service to the labor movement," said Gross, "has been marked by burning interest in education both as a source of strength to the labor movement and as a bridge of understanding between labor and management. Not only did you initiate the establishment of the Rutgers Institute of Management and Labor Relations but also, you have supported steadfastly its educational activities for 13 years."

Dr. Herrmann has been a member of the International Typographical Union for more than 50 years and is that union's liaison with AFL–CIO headquarters. He has served in the New Jersey Legislature and has been active in numerous educational, political, and civic organizations.

Recently, Dr. Herrmann served as chairman of the committee which raised $500,000 to construct the first labor education center on an American campus at Rutgers.

At a testimonial dinner tendered to Dr. Herrmann after the ceremony, President Louis P. Marciante of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor called Herrmann's leadership in the field of education unequaled in labor circles.

"Dr. Herrmann," said Marciante, "pioneered the concept that the labor movement and a great State university can together create a program of labor education to serve all levels of trade union leadership. He was one of those who established the Rutgers Labor Institute in 1931 and he sparked the drive to establish the Rutgers Institute of Management and Labor Relations in 1947. Now he has reached the zenith of a lifelong interest in education in successfully completing the campaign to raise funds for the first university labor education center here at Rutgers."

MOTTO BAITING

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, the debate about national programs to meet national needs has often become simply a matter of name calling. Too often, in fact, debate is replaced by motto baiting. For instance, the cry of "spender" is often uttered without any real thought about the program under discussion.

A gifted New Jersey columnist, William A. Caldwell, of the Bergen Evening Record, Hackensack, N.J., has given voice to some of the confusion which often results from ill-considered pronouncements from some members of the administration.

His very title, "But 50 Million Americans Can't Be Extra," is eloquent in itself. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the article from the June 28 issue of the Bergen Evening Record printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUT 50 MILLION AMERICANS CAN'T BE EXTRA

(By William A. Caldwell)

It is possible, indeed preferable, that we're wrong, but we believe we understand now what Mr. William S. White and the other Washington reporters mean when admiringly, about every 3½ inches of type, they repeat the term "political pro" or "old pro."

They mean persons like Maurice H. Stans, the Director of the Budget.

They mean persons like Christian A. Herter, Secretary of State.

By "old pro" they mean, in a word, amateurs who happen to be getting paid.

It is difficult, considering the damage these solemn "duffers" are capable of doing, to restrain one's impatience with people who insist that we treat seriously, that we respect as professional, the kind of utterance Mr. Stans was allowed to deliver at a meeting of the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce the other night. Let Mr. Herter and his ridiculous guesses wait.

Follow Mr. Stans.

He told the chamber of commerce that Federal spending, by which term he means the budget, now comes to $78.6 billion a year. And this is 16 percent of the gross national product. If that percentage relationship is maintained and the GNP increases to $750 billion a year by 1970, as it is expected to do, then by 1970 Federal spending (the budget) will be $120 billion a year.

We have now reached the point at which we separate the men from the boys.

EXTRA, THE MAN SAYS

Said Mr. Stans:

1. The Nation must decide whether to spend this extra $40 billion a year on services, apply it to a tax reduction, or use it to reduce the national debt.

2. "We can't continue to drift while the spenders reach out for every cent of that $40 billion and push us toward national insolvency."

3. "[Restraint and self-discipline are] the only course that leads to economic strength and security and free world leadership."

Mr. Stans is a pro. An amateur is one who would suggest a little frantically that if in the next 10 years the United States grows from 180 million to 230 million population, with all this means in growing need for education, hospitals, planning, transportation, urban renewal, and the rest of the growing-pains problems—in that case the Federal budget will be an accurate reflection of the needs of the sovereign people. In that case the budget will still be 16 percent of the gross national product. In that case we shall be no closer to national insolvency than we are today. In that case the difference between today's $80 billion budget and 1970's $120 billion budget will not be $40 billion extra; it will be $40 billion.

An amateur would say this, and if he happened to be the kind of liberal amateur that annoys old pros by reading books and applying to public affairs the kind of forethought that any businessman or sane householder applies to private affairs, he would say it might be prudent to make a few arrangements to spend the $40 billion intelligently.

IS "PLAN" A DIRTY WORD?

For the diagnostic symptom of a man's old-proitude is his attitude toward looking ahead. Mr. Herter has cheerfully acknowledged under Senate examination that he didn't anticipate the consequences of the U–2 flight or of sending the old gentleman to wave his arms at the Japanese. He managed somehow to make it sound as if no gentleman would stare so candidly at the naked facts—if the Senators wished to blame him, he said with the icy composure of an early Christian vanishing into a lion, he was prepared to accept the blame. If he were not an old pro Mr. Herter would be told, of course, that he had damned well better.

So it goes with civil rights. The old pro will go slow, meaning not go at all, and when the bloodshed begins, as in due time it will, he'll explain that nobody of gentle breeding could have foreseen such gaucherie and anybody who did foresee it should be ashamed of having so low an opinion of the land of cotton. So it goes with weapons. So it goes with outer space. So it goes with the Nation's protracted lewd attentions to Fascist dictators and oil sheiks.

The businessmen who heard Maurice Stans talk about that $40 billion differential the other night as if it were in fact extra, as if it were a percentage increase, wouldn't let a man who adds like that run the petty-cash drawer in their shop.

But in Government we like that kind of a guy. He's a pro. At the club's first meeting in the fall we shall have a chalk talk on what's the matter with Government. Have a pleasant summer.

HELIPORT AT PATERSON, N.J.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, the citizens of Paterson, N.J., expressed some well-founded civic pride recently when municipal officials there dedicated the first heliport in the Nation built with matching Federal and local funds.

Mr. President, an editorial in the Herald-News, Passaic, N.J., of June 27, expresses that pride and pays tribute to those who are farsighted enough to see the advantages which this and similar projects can bring if the planning for those projects is wise and well-considered. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HELIPORT IN PATERSON

Paterson made some history last week when it dedicated the first heliport in the Nation built with matching Federal and local funds. After 2 years of negotiations with Washington the dream of those seeking to keep Paterson progressive has become a reality. The city and its backers are to be congratulated.

Paterson has embarked on a pioneering venture that experts have been saying for years will become necessary in time. Surrounding communities, as well as cities across the Nation, will be watching to see if now is the time when a municipal heliport can become a paying proposition, even with Federal subsidies.

Despite crowded highways that make trips to airports time-consuming ventures, it may take a while before persons and firms will pay the extra cost of swift service. Plans for carrying mail and cargo from Paterson to other points in the metropolitan area are now being worked out with the Civil Aeronautics Bureau. Passenger service would follow.

If Paterson's heliport pays off, others will be built.

INTEREST ON MONEY BORROWED FROM RETIREMENT FUND

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1835, S. 3147.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3147) relating to interest rates payable on obligations of the United States purchased by the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service with an amendment, after line 6, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. All special issues in which the civil service retirement fund is invested on July 31, 1960, shall be redeemed and reinvested by the Secretary of the Treasury on such date in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the majority leader has asked me to make the following statement for the RECORD in explanation of the bill.

The civil service retirement and disability fund was created by the act of May 22, 1920—the original Civil Service Retirement Act. Deductions from employees' salaries (including Members of Congress), matching amounts contributed by the Government, appropriations from the general fund of the Government, interest earned on fund investments, and donations, gifts, and legacies made for the benefit of civil service employees are credited to the fund. The fund is a separate entity within the total financial structure of the Government and reflects the fiscal posture of the civil service retirement system. The Retirement Act requires that any balance in the fund not needed for current payments will be invested in U.S. Government bonds. The balance in the fund at any one time is the actual difference between what has been credited to it and what has been withdrawn in the form of benefit payments and refunds.

As of April 30, 1960, approximately $9,660 million of the fund was invested in Government securities at an interest rate of 2⅝ percent.

INTEREST RATES

First, 1920 to 1954: During this 34-year period the interest was fixed at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury at a constant rate of 4 percent on all but relatively small amounts representing voluntary contributions to the fund by employees which were invested at 3 percent.

Second, 1954 to 1956: Effective July 1, 1954, the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to the authority vested in him by the Retirement Act, reduced the rate of interest to 3 percent.

Third, since 1956: Public Law 854, 84th Congress, amending the Retirement Act, contains a provision incorporated at the suggestion of the administration providing that the rate be equal to the average coupon rate (rounded to the nearest one-eighth of 1 percent) borne by all marketable interest-bearing obligations of the United States forming a part of the public debt that are not due or callable until after the expiration of 5 years from the date of original issue. Initially, the rate under this provision was 2½ percent. Currently, it is 2⅝ percent.

THE ISSUE

The administration and the committee agree that the present formula is not proper and that the current yield is well below what it should be under existing conditions.

The committee explored three alternative methods of interest fixing as follows:

First. Shift from the coupon to market yield basis, and include only those issues not due or callable until after 3 years from date of computation.

This method would give the fund the same rate of interest—no more nor no less—as any large lender loaning money to the Government.

As of April 30, 1960, under the above method, the rate of interest would have been 4⅜ percent.

Second. Same as method 1, except include only issues not due or callable until after 5 years.

As of April 30, 1960, the rate of interest under this method would have been 4⅛ percent.

Third. Continue to use coupon basis provided by existing law except include all issues instead of only those not due or callable until after 5 years from date of original issue.

As of April 30, 1960, this method would have provided an interest rate of 3½ percent.

The committee, after full consideration of all the factors involved, reached the conclusion that method 3, described above, provides the most appropriate basis for fixing the rate of interest on moneys borrowed by the U.S. Treasury from the civil service retirement and disability fund. This method of computing interest rates has considerable precedent in Government lending programs. While the rate is currently somewhat less than under either of the other methods considered, it would be well above what the fund is now receiving, would not be subject to the fluctuations of any formula based on market yield, and in the long run would be fair and equitable. By the same token, the committee believes it reasonable that the conversion to the new method should occur at once. Section 2 of the bill added by committee amendment would accomplish this objective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION TO REGISTRY OF CERTAIN FOREIGN-BUILT HYDROFOIL VESSELS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1848, House bill 3900.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 3900) to permit the admission to registry and the use in the coastwise trade of certain foreign-built hydrofoil vessels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the majority leader has asked me to make the following statement as to the purpose of the bill:

H.R. 3900, as reported, would authorize enrollment and licensing as vessels of the United States of two foreign-built hydrofoil vessels of less than 100 gross tons each, for the purpose of transporting passengers and property between and among ports wholly within the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. One of the two vessels to be so enrolled and licensed is the hydrofoil Flying Fish, built in Messina, Italy, and owned by Calderone Enterprises Corp., Hempstead, N.Y., which has been in operation for some months in the Virgin Islands. The second vessel authorized would, it is projected, be of similar type and origin. Documentation of the vessels must take place, the bill provides, within 18 months after the date of enactment of the act, upon compliance with the usual requirements. Participation in the coastwise trade would be permitted only to the extent necessary for the carriage of passengers and baggage, whether for hire or otherwise, and only as long as the vessels shall continue to be owned by a citizen of the United States. As used in the act, the term "citizen of the United States" means a corporation, partnership, or association which is a citizen of the United States within the meaning of section 4132 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (46 U.S.C. 11), and section 2 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended (46 U.S.C. 802).

The Department of Commerce, in its report on S. 2593, the Senate counterpart of H.R. 3900, under date of January 5, 1960, did not recommend favorable action, stating:

> Due to the fact that hydrofoil vessels are now obtainable in the United States, the Department is not in favor of an exception to the coastwise laws of the United States to authorize the use of foreign-built vessels in the coastwise trade.

However, at the House hearing on February 3, 1960, the Acting Coordinator of Research, Maritime Administrator, William I. Niedermair, qualified the Commerce Department report as follows:

> They (hydrofoil vessels) are obtainable, but not on a production basis. They are not at present produced in the United States.

In view of this, he suggested that the bill would be acceptable if amended to provide that no vessel be admitted to documentation under this act after 18 months from the date of approval thereof. The bill was amended accordingly.

The report of the Department of the Navy on S. 2593, dated November 3, 1959, offered no objection to enactment, suggesting that foreign construction of the vessels would have little effect on the American shipbuilding industry and that operation of the hydrofoil vessels, if successful, could lead to future construction of this type of vessel in U.S. shipyards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL OFFICER FOR THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1896, House bill 11516.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 11516) to create a judicial officer for the Post Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the purpose of this legislation is to strengthen administrative proceedings in postal fraud and obscenity cases by establishing in the Post Office Department a judicial officer to perform quasi-judicial duties which the Postmaster General delegates to him.

The legislation will result in no additional position or employee in the Department since the position was established by administrative action in 1958. However, certain of the duties assigned to the judicial officer were rendered ineffective by a court decision. The court enjoined enforcement of a fraud order on the ground that the judicial officer who presided at the reception of evidence in the case was without authority to do so under the Administrative Procedure Act. The court found in effect that legislative authority is necessary in order to permit the judicial officer to perform this function.

The bill accomplishes this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BONDING OF PERSONS ENGAGED IN REPAIR, ETC., OF RESIDENTIAL PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1902, Senate bill 3727.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3727) to provide for the bonding of persons engaging in the repair, remodeling, alteration, conversion, or modernization of residential property; to impose limitations on the assertion of mechanics liens where payment has been made for work in connection with the repair, remodeling, alteration, conversion, or modernization of residential property; and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized, in connection with the licensing of persons engaged in the home improvement business, whether as principal, agent, salesman, employee, or otherwise, to require the furnishing of bond as a condition to the issuance of such license. For the purposes of this Act, the term "home improvement business" means the repair, remodeling, alteration, conversion, or modernization of, or addition to, residential property, all as may be more particularly defined in regulations promulgated by the Commissioners. Such bonding may be required notwithstanding the fact that a person may also be subject to the bonding requirements of any other law.

SEC. 2. (a) The Commissioners may, from time to time, and in their discretion, establish classes and subclasses of persons licensed to engage in the home improvement business and specify the amount and conditions of the bond or other security acceptable to the Commissioners to be deposited by each of the members of any such class or subclass. In connection with the licensing of persons to engage in the home improvement business, and the bonding of the members of any such class or subclass of such persons, the Commissioners, in their discretion, may by regulation require applicants for licenses or licensees—

(1) to furnish and keep in force a bond or bonds running to the District, or other security acceptable to the Commissioners, to protect members of the public against financial loss by reason of the failure of the licensee or of any officer, agent, employee, salesman, or other person acting on behalf of said licensee, to observe any law or regulation in force in the District of Columbia applicable to the licensee's conduct of the licensed business;

(2) to procure and keep in force public liability insurance or property damage insurance, or both; and

(3) to appoint the Commissioners as their true and lawful attorney upon whom all judicial and other process or legal notice directed to such person may be served.

(b) The bonds authorized by this section shall be corporate surety bonds in amounts to be fixed by the Commissioners, but no bond shall exceed $25,000, and such bond shall be conditioned upon the observance by the licensee and any officer, agent, employee, salesman, or other person acting on behalf of said licensee, of all laws and regulations in force in the District applicable to the licensee's conduct of the licensed business, for the benefit of any person who may suffer damages resulting from the violation of any such law or regulation by or on the part of such licensee or any officer, agent, employee, salesman, or other person acting on behalf of the licensee.

(c) Any person aggrieved by the violation of any law or regulation applicable to the licensee's conduct of the licensed activity shall have, in addition to his right of action against such licensee, a right to bring suit against the surety on a bond authorized by this section, either alone or jointly with the principal thereon, and to recover in an amount not exceeding the penalty of the bond any damages sustained by reason of any act, transaction, or conduct of the licensee, or of any officer, agent, employee, salesman, or other person acting on behalf of said licensee, which is in violation of law or regulation in force in the District relating to the licensed activity. The provisions of the second, third, and fifth subparagraphs of paragraph (b) of the first section of the Act entitled "An Act to grant additional powers to the Commissioners, and for other purposes", approved December 20, 1944 (58 Stat. 820; sec. 1–244(b), D.C. Code, 1951 edition), shall be applicable to each bond authorized by this section as if it were the bond authorized by the first subparagraph of such paragraph (b) of the first section of said Act approved December 20, 1944: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed to impose upon the surety on any such bond a greater liability than the total amount thereof or the amount remaining unextinguished after any prior recovery or recoveries.

SEC. 3. In any case in which a property owner or occupant has entered into a contract with a person offering to perform or to arrange for the performance of home improvement work, and such property owner or occupant makes payment for such work to the person offering to perform or arrange for the performance of the same, proof of such payment shall constitute a defense against, and render void, any lien sought to be asserted under the authority of sections 1237, 1238, and 1239 of the Act approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1384; secs. 38–101, 102, and 103, D.C. Code, 1951 edition).

SEC. 4. Any person who shall violate any provision of this Act or of any regulation promulgated by the Commissioners under the authority of this Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or by imprisonment for not more than ninety days, or both.

SEC. 5. Prosecutions for violations of this Act, or of the regulations made pursuant thereto, shall be conducted in the name of the District by the Corporation Counsel or any of his assistants. As used in this Act the term "Corporation Counsel" means the attorney for the District, by whatever title such attorney may be known, designated by the Commissioners to perform the functions prescribed for the Corporation Counsel in this Act.

SEC. 6. The authority and power vested in the Commissioners by any provision of this Act shall be deemed to be additional and supplementary to authority and power now vested in them, and not as a limitation.

SEC. 7. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, such invalidity shall not affect other provisions or the application of this Act which can be effected without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this Act are severable.

SEC. 8. This Act shall take effect on the thirtieth day after the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is twofold, as follows:

First. To authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to require that persons licensed to engage in the home-improvement business be bonded in order to protect those with whom they deal from financial loss; and, second, to alter existing law relating to mechanics' liens in order to protect persons whose homes have been repaired from the assertion of liens by subcontractors after the prime contractor has been paid in full.

Recently, articles in the Washington Post and the Evening and Sunday Star newspapers have brought to the attention of the committee a growing pattern of complaints from homeowners in the District of Columbia who have been victimized by unscrupulous home-improvement contractors.

In the past 5 years such complaints made to the Better Business Bureau of Washington, D.C., have risen in rank among all complaints received by that bureau from sixth to third place, and in the past year such complaints have increased by approximately 40 percent. Since all instances of fraud and abuse are not reported, it is apparent that there is a need for corrective legislation.

The complaints most frequently received stem from the following practices: contractors receiving full payment prior to completion of the job; misrepresentation of the starting and completion dates and of costs; sloppy inferior work; incomplete work; substituted materials; various other breaches of contract; and, improper permits or no permits at all.

Only fly-by-night operators can profit by such practices. The established ethical home-improvement contractor cannot since his greater financial responsibility furnishes an assurance that a homeowner can obtain redress for violation of a home-improvement contract. Requiring home-improvement contractors to furnish a bond for the protection of the public will insure that such contractors will be financially responsible.

Under existing law (sec. 7 of the act of July 1, 1902, title 47, ch. 23, D.C. Code, 1951 ed.), the Commissioners have authority to license persons engaged in the home-improvement business but do not have authority to require bonds and insurance coverage of such persons. Nor do the Commissioners have authority to prevent homeowners from being subjected to dual payment in situations where the prime contractor fails to pay the subcontractor after receiving full payment from the homeowner. In such a situation, a homeowner who has paid the prime contractor for the performance of work finds himself confronted with the necessity of satisfying a mechanic's lien filed under the authority of section 1239 of the act of March 3, 1901 (sec. 38–103, D.C. Code, 1951 ed.) by a subcontractor who has failed to receive payment from the prime contractor for work performed or materials supplied. This situation means that a homeowner must pay twice for work or materials for which only one payment should be required.

S. 3727 would give the Commissioners the authority necessary to fill these gaps in the legal protections available for the benefit of the homeowning public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended, so to read: "A bill to authorize the bonding of persons engaging in the home improvement business, and for other purposes."

USAGE OF CERTAIN REAL PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BY THE NATIONAL SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN COLONISTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1903, House bill 10952.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 10952) to authorize the National Society Daughters of the American Colonists to use certain real property in the District of Columbia as the national headquarters of that society.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to grant an exemption from the District of Columbia zoning plan to the National Society Daughters of the American Colonists in order that they may locate their national headquarters on lot 807 in square numbered 2512, also known as 2205 Massachusetts Avenue NW., in the city of Washington, D.C.

The National Society Daughters of the American Colonists, with chapters in every State in the Union except three, was incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia in 1921.

Among the many patriotic and worthwhile objectives of the society are the following: To make research as to the history and deeds of the American colonists, and to record and publish the same; to erect memorials to commemorate colonial deeds and places of interest; to inculcate and foster the love of America and its institutions, by all its residents; to obey its laws, and to venerate its flag, the emblem of its power and civic righteousness; and for mutual improvement and educational purposes.

The property which the society desires to use is presently zoned "residential B restricted." This zoning classification does not permit a use such as is sought by this bill. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia in a letter dated June 23, 1960, have reported to the committee as follows:

> The Commissioners having previously opposed special zoning treatment by legislation cannot recommend favorably action on H.R. 10952. However, since the Commissioners believe the contemplated use of the property as authorized by the bill will have no adverse effect on neighboring property, they do not offer objection to its passage.

Enactment of the bill will not result in additional expense to the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF LIFE INSURANCE ACT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1904, House bill 10921.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 10921) to amend section 35 of chapter III of the Life Insurance Act for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments, on page 2, line 10, after the word "restrictive", to strike out "conditions or"; on page 6, line 4, after the word "receivers", to strike out "or any" and insert "of any"; in line 8, after the word "having", to strike out "jurisdiction" and insert "jurisdiction: Provided, That no company shall invest an amount in excess of 2 per centum of its admitted assets in any one issue of such certificates, notes or other obligations of any one corporation"; on page 10, after line 11, to strike out:

> (j) The last paragraph of section 35 of chapter III of the Life Insurance Act (D.C. Code 35–535) is amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "Any domestic life insurance company may acquire and hold securities or other property if distributed to it as a dividend or as a lawful distribution of assets, or if acquired by it pursuant to a lawful plan of reorganization, or if acquired pursuant to a lawful and bona fide agreement of bulk reinsurance or consolidation. If any securities so acquired shall consist in whole or in part of stock or shares of any company, or of bonds or other obligations, which do not meet the requirements for eligibility set out in this section, then any such securities so received shall be disposed of within five years from the time of acquisition, unless at any time after such acquisition the securities shall have met such requirements and the company has notified the Superintendent thereof, or unless the company file with the Superintendent of Insurance an application for extension of time, supported by such evidence as may be required by the Superintendent, establishing to his satisfaction that an extension would be to the advantage of the company and that the interests of the company would be affected adversely by a forced sale thereof, in which event the time for the sale may be extended to such time as the Superintendent shall direct."

And, on page 11, after line 10, to insert a new section, as follows:

> SEC. 2. The amendments made by this Act shall become effective on September 1, 1960.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to modernize the section of the act of June 19, 1934—section 35–535, D.C. Code—which governs and regulates investments which life insurance companies domiciled in the District of Columbia are authorized to make. The bill has the support of the District of Columbia life insurance companies, has been approved by the Superintendent of Insurance of the District of Columbia, and has been recommended for adoption by the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The bill amends section 35 of chapter III of the Life Insurance Act for the District of Columbia, as follows:

Section 1(a) of the bill amends subsection 5(a) of section 35 of the act, which provides that a life insurance company can invest in a mortgage loan only when such loan is secured by a first lien on real estate, and which further provides that real estate, for the purposes of this section shall not be deemed to be encumbered by reason of the existence of certain listed items. The bill will amend the listed items in accordance with the following:

First. Under existing law taxes and assessments levied by a governmental agency are not deemed to be encumbrances. It is proposed that charges for maintenance and community services—in the nature of taxes—made by nongovernmental agencies be treated in the same manner as taxes and assessments levied by governmental agencies. In many areas such facilities as trash collection, maintenance of streets, and so forth, are provided by the subdivision developer rather than the city, and the developer charges or assesses the cost of such services against each property on an equitable basis. The developer retains a lien for the collection of such charges which is similar to the lien for taxes and assessments levied by a municipality. Such charges, unless paid by the mortgagor or mortgagee, constitute a lien prior to a mortgage. In practice, of course, a life insurance company holding a mortgage protects against such a lien by paying the charges, if necessary, which thereby are added to the mortgage debt. The effect on the security for the mortgage is the same whether the charges or assessments are levied by the municipality or the developer. This amendment makes it clear that such charges or assessments levied by a nongovernmental agency are not encumbrances.

Second. Under present law, instruments creating or reserving mineral, oil, water, or timber rights, and so forth, are not deemed to be encumbrances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TENURE OF OFFICE OF INDIVIDUALS APPOINTED TO ADMINISTRATIVE AND POLICYMAKING POSTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1825, Senate Resolution 338.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to considered the resolution (S. Res. 338) relating to tenure of office of individuals appointed to administrative and policymaking posts in the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt from the report on the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the report (No. 1753) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Government Operations recommend that the resolution as, amended, do pass.

AMENDMENT

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, paragraph 4, after the word "policies" strike out the semicolon and the word "and," insert a comma and add the following language: "while the Nation has been well served through continuity of service in office by other officials; and".

PURPOSE

Senate Resolution 338 was introduced by Mr. JACKSON, as chairman, for himself and the membership of the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. MUNDT, and Mr. JAVITS. Its purpose is to record the concern of the Senate over the extent and impact of turnover in policymaking and administrative posts in the executive branch of Government, particularly in the national security field. In view of its constitutional duties with respect to foreign and military policies, and its specific constitutional responsibility to pass on Presidential nominations, it is appropriate that the Senate formally express its views on this subject. It is also appropriate, as the resolution specifically states, that the Senate—through its committees—adopt the practice of exploring with nominees their readiness and willingness to serve in office "so long as the President desires."

BACKGROUND STATEMENT

The turnover of top "political executives" has long plagued the executive branch of Government. This problem must, of course, be considered apart from the normal turnover which accompanies every change of administration.

As the resolution states, the problem has not been confined to any one administration. A recent study by the Brookings Institution noted that "too frequently, political appointees come to their posts without any prior Federal experience and depart in a year or two without having served in more than one position. This has often been the case under the Eisenhower administration, as it was for its predecessors."

Any doubt as to the longstanding nature of the problem may be quickly resolved by a glance at statistics compiled by the Harbord Business School Club of Washington, D.C. It questioned 456 businessmen who had served in Government and left some time between 1940 and 1956, a period covering four administrations of three Presidents. Of this group, 48 percent served 1 year or less. The median for the entire group was 1¼ years.

Likewise, the 1955 report of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government on "Personnel and Civil Service," through its task force, took note of "the high and increasing rate of turnover of top noncareer executives, especially in the assistant and under secretarial positions."

The report fixed the average months' service of Under Secretaries from 1948 to 1952 at 23 months; the average service of Assistant Secretaries in the same period at 28 months.

Figures compiled for the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery tell the same story in more specific terms. For example, since the Office of Secretary of Defense was created in 1947, it has been filled by seven different men (average term: less than 2 years). Nine men have served as Deputy Secretary of Defense since that post was established in 1949 (average term: less than 18 months). During the same period, six different men served as Director of the Bureau of the Budget (average term: less than 2 years), and six different men served as Under Secretary of State (average term: less than 2 years). Since 1953, four different men have directed our foreign aid programs (average term: less than 2 years).

These examples can be multiplied many times over. While they amply illustrate the problem, they do not indicate the cumulative impact of turnover on the effectiveness with which programs and policies are formulated and executed in the national security field. Any single departure may not have a significant impact. But in the aggregate, the numerous arrivals and departures have an inevitable effect on the attempt to develop the kind of programs and policies which only knowledge and experience produce. One can imagine the increased burdens on those who remained and the complications for effective administration when, during one period of 6 months, the Department of Defense alone lost its Deputy Secretary, three Assistant Secretaries, and its General Counsel. And the effects of a mass exodus of this sort are compounded by the complex interrelationships between departments and agencies in the national security field.

At the same time, the long and dedicated service of many appointees in all recent administrations must be recognized. The continuity of their service and their contribution is specifically recognized by the amendment to the resolution adopted by the committee.

Since its first public hearings last February, the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery has heard many witnesses, both from Government and private life, dwell on the harmful effects of turnover in top Government posts. The burden of their testimony is clear: that turnover—against the backdrop of the cold-war challenge—has acquired the dimensions of a national problem and must be dealt with as such, not merely discussed and dismissed as beyond reform.

The Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Roger W. Jones, told the subcommittee that turnover had reached an "extremely dangerous" point.

The Director of Defense Research and Engineering, Dr. Herbert F. York, testified that "what you have to do is get people to come with fresh outside experience and hope that then they will stay long enough so that they can also build up personal knowledge and experience with regard to how to do things within the Government. Rapid turnover is one of the most serious problems, I think, we have. Again, this applies largely to the very top levels, the Presidential appointment levels. The average length of time a person holds his job—and this is not a new problem—is not really long enough to develop expertise at doing what needs to be done."

Marion B. Folsom, a director of the Eastman Kodak Co. and former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, noted that "it is difficult to get able people down here. By the time that they get well trained they leave. I know that it would be very difficult to run a business on that basis."

John J. Corson, a former Federal official, now a management consultant, who worked on recruiting Government executives, told the subcommittee that "experience over the past 7 years in recruiting for and retaining high talent in the governmental post, where national security policies are formulated and executed, demonstrates, with dangerous clarity, the difficulties our Government encounters."

And he cited as one major area of difficulty the fact that "these critically important governmental posts have been filled by a succession of able individuals who serve, on the average, 2 years or less. In short, the men responsible for aiding the President to formulate and carry out this Government's national security policies are a very transitory group—not all of them, but a substantial proportion."

Testimony before the subcommittee on this subject has stressed the growing intricacies of decisionmaking and program formulation in the national security field. The very complexities of our response to the cold war challenge—in all its economic, political, military, psychological, and scientific ramifications—have accentuated the impact of turnover. As Robert A. Lovett, the former Secretary of Defense, put it:

"It takes a long time for an able man without previous military service of some importance and experience in Government to catch up with his job in this increasingly complex Department (Defense). At a guess, I would say he could pay good dividends to the Government in about 2 years. Meanwhile, of course, he is becoming a more valuable asset each day. To lose him before, or just as he becomes productive is manifestly a serious waste of the effort that went into his training."

The present Secretary of Defense, Thomas S. Gates, Jr., told the subcommittee that "from the standpoint of the ability to do the work, I would agree with a 3- to 4-year requirement as being about correct. I think you can only start to make a contribution after the first year."

And in his address at the University of Notre Dame on June 5, President Eisenhower told his audience that "some frequency of withdrawal and return to private life would help eliminate the dangerous concept that permanence in office is more important than the rightness of decision. Contrariwise, such a tour should not be so brief as to minimize the value of the contribution and diminish the quality of public service. Normally, a 4-year period in these policy posts would seem to be a minimum."

The factors behind the high rate of turnover are many and varied. Some of them can be identified and evaluated at the appointment stage. In particular, the turnover problem can be reduced by ending the practice of appointing men with the understanding from the outset that they will serve only a limited period.

Some of the factors contributing to turnover, particularly financial factors, may be approached legislatively. The Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery expects to have recommendations on this subject ready for presentation to the next Congress.

In the meantime, the subcommittee believes a useful purpose can be served through a formal declaration by the Senate of its concern over the turnover in top governmental posts and its intention—through its committees—to explore with nominees their readiness and willingness to serve in office "so long as the President desires." Such recognition of the problem will, hopefully, not only be a first step toward its resolution, but also help lead to a more positive public attitude toward Government service.

Senate Resolution 338 is based on the premise that we need, and must have in Government the best scientists, the best lawyers, the best diplomats, the best planners, and the best administrators this country has to offer. Above all, we need the finest leadership—at the Cabinet and subcabinet levels throughout Government—which we can produce. On the decisions made and actions taken by this small group of men at the heart of the governmental process hangs the success of our national security policies.

These men must be experienced in the arts of government. They must be able to cope with the most complex, scientific, military, and political factors. They must be able to go to the core of a problem, reach decisions, and provide strong leadership. This requires the finest talent we can muster—talent that will stay long enough to make its weight felt. Unless we can dedicate leadership of this caliber to Government service, we cannot expect to succeed in the drawn-out contest with the Sino-Soviet bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 338) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that individuals appointed to administrative and policymaking posts should be willing to serve for a period long enough to permit them to contribute effectively in their assigned tasks; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that nominees appearing before its committees shall indicate their willingness to serve so long as the President desires.

The preamble was amended, and was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the requirements for policy planning and decisionmaking in the national security field have placed a premium on knowledgeable, experienced executives; and

Whereas the complexities and technicalities of national security problems have steadily increased the minimum period of Government experience required before responsibilities can be discharged effectively; and

Whereas brief tenure in office tends to have a harmful impact on the effective formulation and execution of national security policies while the Nation has been well served through continuity of service in office by other officials; and

Whereas the problem of turnover has not been confined in its effects to any one administration: Now, therefore, be it

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, at some future date I probably shall have some comment to make on this resolution.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I would be delighted to join in the comment. But in the interest of expediting the business of the Senate today, I am sure that at this time there is no need to discuss in detail the resolution which has just now been agreed to.

I merely wish to say that the committee was unanimous. The resolution was cosponsored by all members of the subcommittee.

As a matter of fact, the resolution is in keeping with the comments made by the President in the course of the very fine address he made at Notre Dame, a short time ago, on the subject of tenure in the important area of national security.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPUBLICAN RESPONSIBILITY VERSUS DEMOCRATIC REACTION IN THE U–2 INCIDENT AND SUMMIT BLOWUP

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there has been a lot of talk about the U–2 incident and the collapse of the summit conference.

The senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] has written a report on this matter which deserves the attention of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle. I commend it to them and ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN RESPONSIBILITY VERSUS DEMOCRATIC REACTION IN THE U–2 INCIDENT AND SUMMIT BLOWUP

(By U.S. Senator PRESCOTT BUSH, of Connecticut)

We have long been aware of the North-South conflict within the Democratic Party, and the rifts which exist between the radical wing and the moderates and conservatives.

But a more serious division has recently arisen on an issue which never should have been injected into partisan domestic politics. I refer, of course, to the discordant voices in the Democratic Party since the U–2 espionage plane incident and the collapse of the summit conference.

Who speaks for the Democratic Party on foreign policy, and the related issues which involve the security of the United States, and the safety of every American family?

Is it Adlai Stevenson, who claims President Eisenhower gave Khrushchev a "sledge hammer and a crowbar" to wreck the summit conference?

Or is it Jim Farley, who says Stevenson attempts to use the U–2 incident "to 'sledge hammer and crowbar' another disastrous nomination for himself as the apostle of appeasement out of the Democratic Party"?

Is it JACK KENNEDY, who said the President should "apologize" or "express regret" to Khrushchev for the flight of the U–2 over Soviet territory?

Or is it LYNDON JOHNSON, who shouted to the Washington State convention at Spokane: "I am not prepared to apologize to Mr. Khrushchev. I am not prepared to send regrets to Mr. Khrushchev"?

I have said this issue should never have been injected into partisan domestic politics. But since the Democrats have done it, I say to you that we are fortunate as we proceed to nominate our candidate for President.

We can leave it to the Democrats to accuse each other of being, in Mr. Farley's words, "apostles of appeasement." We can let the Democrats imply, as Senator JOHNSON did, that if a certain Democrat were elected President he might feel compelled to apologize or express regret to Khrushchev.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S DEMONSTRATED ABILITY

We have a candidate for our presidential nomination who has demonstrated—in Moscow—his ability to stand up to Khrushchev, and refuse to knuckle under in response to truculent threats.

We have a candidate who has demonstrated—in Latin America—his physical courage under assault by Communist-led mobs.

We have a candidate who, by his long service on the National Security Council, knows what must be done to preserve the freedom of the United States and of the free world.

We have a candidate, tested and trained for the job, supremely qualified to assume the grave responsibilities of the President of the United States.

We have a candidate who will be a worthy successor to our great President, Dwight D. Eisenhower, a man who knows the Eisenhower policies and is ready to build upon that firm foundation to a greater America—RICHARD M. NIXON.

WHAT THE U–2 ACCOMPLISHED

I should like now to discuss the U–2 incident and the torpedoing of the summit conference by Mr. Khrushchev in terms of what these events mean to us as Americans.

The flights of the U–2 planes over Soviet territory which have taken place over the past 4 years have given the U.S. information of incalculable value.

We have learned the location of the Russian missile bases, planes, submarines and centers of arms production, including atomic plants. Photographs taken at the extraordinary height of 70,000 feet have revealed these vital target areas with striking clarity.

The penetration of the borders of the Soviet Union by our planes has disproved Khrushchev's boasts about the invulnerability of his air defenses. It now appears conclusive that the Soviet's antiaircraft missiles have been unable to reach our planes flying at heights of 70,000 feet, and that Pilot Powers' plane was downed only after a "flame-out" forced him to descend to lower levels.

This knowledge was essential to the defense of the United States and of the entire free world. Committed as we are not to strike the first blow against any nation, our security has depended upon our ability to retaliate against any attack upon us or our allies with instant, terrible destruction. To retaliate effectively, we must know where the vital targets are, and we must know that SAC, our major retaliatory force, can get through to them.

The U–2 flights gave the men with responsibility for our defenses—President Eisenhower, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the civilian Secretaries of our armed services and others within a limited circle—the knowledge they had to have to plan a safe level of our own military power. This information was not available, for obvious security reasons, to Senator SYMINGTON and other critics who have been demanding billions of dollars more in spending for defense.

INTELLIGENCE OPERATIONS MUST CONTINUE

President Eisenhower has suspended U–2 flights over the Soviet Union for the balance of his term. We shall have to depend on other methods, including photo reconnaissance satellites which soon will be in the skies, for gathering this information which the United States must have for her protection, and the protection of the free world.

Our intelligence operations must continue, by whatever means are available, until the Soviet Union accepts President Eisenhower's offer to have the United Nations conduct "open skies" surveillance over the entire world.

The collapse of the summit conference was a blow to the hopes of the British and others among our allies, who believed that face-to-face meetings by the heads of states could bring meaningful progress toward peaceful coexistence.

But it also resulted in a strengthening of the unity between the United States and her allies. Mr. Khrushchev's vitriolic denunciations of President Eisenhower have sent a wave of revulsion around the world, and have drawn the nations of the West closer together. There is going on, among our allies, a realistic reappraisal.

Here at home, the breakdown of the summit conference also calls for reappraisal of our position in the world, and of our responsibilities. On assignment by the Senate Committee on Armed Services, I have visited our military outposts, not only in Western Europe, but also in the Far East. I have been with the Sixth Fleet, in the Mediterranean, and the Seventh Fleet in the Straits of Formosa and the Philippine Sea. I believe I have some understanding of the dangers we face and of the extent of our commitments throughout this troubled planet.

COMMUNISTS MAKE "COEXISTENCE" SEEM UNREALISTIC

To me, talk of "peaceful coexistence" has seemed unrealistic in view of Communist China's bitter enmity of the United States. It might have been possible to reach agreement with the Soviet Union on control of atomic weapons, for it is as much in her interest as ours to keep this terrible destructive power out of the hands of the Chinese Reds. But it is hard to see how we could reach significant overall disarmament agreements with Russia when we are committed to resist aggression by Communist China in the Far East.

In this unstable area, the Chinese Communists are constantly probing for weak spots. Had it not been for the Seventh Fleet, a constant reminder of the power of the United States, I believe many small nations in the East would already have been crushed by the Reds.

Now that world tensions have been heightened by the breakdown at the summit, America must face the unpleasant fact that we may well become involved in at least small wars, and possible fairly large ones in the Far East.

The summit collapse may prove to be a blessing in disguise if it awakens the American people to reality.

WE MUST ACCEPT RISK; PAY PRICE

If we are to maintain our exposed positions all over the world we must recognize the risks and be willing to pay the price.

Now that our Western allies have been restored, with our help, to positions of economic strength, we must call upon them to do more in the common defense.

But even should our allies share more of the costs, we must still pay a large price for our security.

That price means greater expenditures for defense, for scientific and space research and for education, including scientific and vocational training.

It means giving up some of our luxuries, and the "business as usual" philosophy.

It means an unceasing search for ways to achieve economies in our National Government; a ruthless war on waste and extravagance wherever found; and a system of priorities in Government spending which "puts first things first." Failure to face up to these necessities could mean higher Federal taxes.

As Americans and as Republicans, as the party of responsibility, we have a solemn obligation to place these facts before the people.

The times are too serious for a campaign in which unpleasant facts are obscured, the sky is the limit on promises, and the question of who is to pay if promises are fulfilled is conveniently ignored. Both parties have conducted this kind of a campaign in the past, although I believe our opponents have sinned in this respect far more than have we.

And I believe the American people will respond to a campaign of truth and honesty. In times of stress in this great Nation, the people have always risen to the occasion. So shall it be in this troubled year of 1960.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

the United States of America to the Congo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations in the Coast and Geodetic Survey be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Robert S. Rankin to be a member of the Commission on Civil Rights.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in my opinion, the law which created the Commission on Civil Rights is unconstitutional. Furthermore, in my opinion, the law is unwise, unnecessary, and impractical. It has created tensions. It has not promoted the welfare of the public, but has created dissension between races.

I am opposed to the confirmation of the nomination of anyone to the Civil Rights Commission. Therefore, I oppose the appointment of the nominee in this instance. I do not know the nominee or anything about him. However, I am opposed to the law for the reasons stated; therefore, I oppose the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is: Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Robert S. Rankin, of North Carolina, to be a member of the Commission on Civil Rights?

The nomination was confirmed.

U.S. MARSHAL

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Ralph W. Gray to be U.S. marshal for the district of Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of the nominations confirmed this day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

REGISTER OF CERTAIN PERSONS WHOSE MOTOR VEHICLE LICENSES HAVE BEEN REVOKED

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1898, H.R. 5436.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H.R. 5436) to provide for a register in the Department of Commerce in which shall be listed the names of certain persons who have had their motor vehicle operators' licenses revoked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the bill was reported by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] has a deep interest in the bill and has spoken to me about it several times.

The Senator from Washington is unable to be present at the moment, but has stated that he would be glad to have the measure considered. He believed it will be desirable legislation, and he hopes we may accede to the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

The purpose of the bill is to require the Secretary of Commerce to maintain a register containing the names of persons, as reported by States and other political subdivisions, whose driver's licenses have been revoked for driving while intoxicated or traffic violations resulting in loss of life. It also requires the Secretary of Commerce, upon request, to furnish to any State or political subdivision information contained in the register. It is completely voluntary on the part of the States and other political subdivisions whether they send in the names or make use of the register.

On June 7, I introduced S. 3635, the first bill in the U.S. Senate to provide for the establishment of a Driver Records Clearance Center in the Department of Commerce. I believe this earlier bill would have been preferable to S. 3745, because it would allow the Secretary of Commerce to move ahead as fast as he found practical in expanding the types of offenses covered by the Federal clearinghouse. However, the more limited approach represented by S. 3745, of which I am a cosponsor, appears to be the only one which can get through Congress during the annual adjournment rush, and I am therefore glad to urge its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

DALWORTH C. EBNER

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1801, S. 299.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 299) for the relief of Dalworth C. Ebner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That (a) notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or any regulation promulgated by the Veterans' Administration, Dalworth C. Ebner, of Austin, Texas, shall be eligible to receive training under the provisions of chapter 31 of title 38, United States Code, for any period equal to the period for which he would have been eligible to receive training under part VII of veterans regulation numbered 1(a) if the Veterans' Administration had not terminated his training under such part in March 1954 because of unauthorized adjustments made by him in his training program, the said Dalworth C. Ebner not having been informed that such adjustments would result in the termination of his training eligibility under such part.

(b) Any such period of training to which the said Dalworth C. Ebner is made eligible by virtue of the enactment of this Act shall remain available to him for the same period of time it would have been available if his training eligibility under part VII of veterans regulation numbered 1(a) had not been terminated, except that such period shall not commence to run until the said Dalworth C. Ebner resumes his training subsequent to the enactment of this Act. No training under the provisions of chapter 31 of title 38, United States Code, shall be afforded the said Dalworth C. Ebner as a result of the enactment of this Act unless such training is instituted within one year after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1622(a) of chapter 33 of title 38, United States Code, limiting the number of times a veteran may change his program of education or training, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall permit John Wessels, of St. Johnsbury, Vermont, to pursue apprentice or on-the-job training in printing under such chapter if (1) the said John Wessels makes application to the Veterans' Administration for such training within one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, and (2) the Administrator determines that the said John Wessels is otherwise eligible for such training.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] raised objection to the bill on the call of the calendar. However, he notified me before he left the Chamber a few minutes ago that he had removed his objection. I am informed by the staff of the calendar committee that there is no other objection to the bill. It is a private bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement of the purpose of the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT OF THE PURPOSE OF THE BILL DALWORTH C. EBNER

Mr. Dalworth C. Ebner, of Austin, Tex., was eligible for vocational training under the veterans' rehabilitation program because of a service-connected disability. He is now rated as 50 percent disabled because of psychoneurosis. He enrolled in the University of Texas in midsummer 1953, in the field of engineering. Mr. Ebner's aptitude tests and discussions with university officials revealed excellent promise in mathematics and natural science.

In securing assistance under the rehabilitation program, Mr. Ebner discussed his needs and program requirements with the veterans' representative at the university and with the Veterans' Administration. The Veterans' Administration told him that he must attempt to earn a degree in engineering and that only 3 years remained until the delimiting date of the program, then called the Public Law 16 program.

According to the evidence submitted to the committee, a statement was required of Mr. Ebner to the effect that if, by the delimiting date he had not acquired the degree, he would nevertheless consider himself to be rehabilitated insofar as educational benefits were concerned, and that he would complete his education at his own expense. Under the terms of this agreement, Mr. Ebner enrolled in the University of Texas in midsummer of 1953.

Shortly after commencement of his education, a controversy developed between Mr. Ebner and the Veterans' Administration because, being the sole support for his mother, his wife, and four children, he was working part time in order to bolster his GI subsistence allowance. The VA finally relented in this instance.

During the first 6 months of school, Mr. Ebner was able to get ahead of his schedule. The VA schedule for the next semester called for a workload by Mr. Ebner which could not be matched exactly. He could either register for 1 semester-hour less, or for 2 semester-hours more. In response to a VA directive that "you are cautioned not to enroll for less [than a certain number of hours]," Mr. Ebner took on a heavier load, a minimum of 30 hours a week in the classroom. The load was much more than he could tolerate, so he took his problem to Dean L. L. Click of the school of arts and sciences at the university. After Dean Click had held a conference with the Veterans' Administration, he advised Mr. Ebner that the VA was adamant but that he, the dean, knew that Public Law 16 required only that he meet minimum requirements of the college. It was Dean Click's decision that, since Mr. Ebner was behind in six courses, he should drop two and salvage four, stating that the remaining load was still within minimum requirements of the university.

On March 11, 1954, Mr. Ebner complied with the dean's decision. On March 12, 1954, the VA advised Mr. Ebner that his training was terminated, effective immediately. The VA contended that Public Law 16 required that Mr. Ebner be in a position at all times to show that he would have a degree by the delimiting date of Public Law 16. Mr. Ebner disagreed with this position because it was inconsistent with the statement required of him at the beginning of his training, and because Public Law 16 specified only that the veteran attain an employment objective.

In response to Mr. Ebner's stated disagreement, the VA invited him to meet with two of their representatives on the university campus on March 21, 1954. In attendance at this conference was a disinterested party, Mr. Delmar W. Sears, personnel officer of the Austin post office (at this time Mr. Ebner was working as a substitute letter carrier in the Austin post office).

Mr. Ebner stated that later that day one of these VA representatives phoned him and stated that a degree was not mandatory. Since this was in direct opposition to what he had previously been told, he contacted the disinterested party, Mr. Delmar W. Sears. Mr. Sears obtained the same information firsthand from the same source and gave Mr. Ebner his affidavit concerning the matter.

In Mr. Sears' statement, which is on file with the committee, Mr. Sears states that he called the veterans' adviser, and having first been informed in Ebner's presence that Ebner would have to obtain a degree by the delimiting date, he was next informed that if Mr. Ebner could outline a proposed schedule of classes which would make him employable upon the completion of such classes, and have it approved by the university professors and by the counseling division of the VA in Waco, he could continue his schooling under Public Law 16, despite the fact that he would not have a sufficient number of hours to receive a degree by July 1956, the delimiting date of the program.

In a desperate effort for rehabilitation, Mr. Ebner requested training in a small accounting school. The VA accepted this application, and in June of 1954, Mr. Ebner enrolled in this school where no degree was possible.

Soon thereafter the post office eliminated part-time jobs, and Mr. Ebner was forced by his responsibilities to return to full-time employment. The physical exertion of carrying mail caused such rapid deterioration of Mr. Ebner's condition that on March 22, 1955, he appealed to the appeal board for reinstatement to training at the University of Texas. The appeal was denied.

Although the committee does not feel that the Veterans' Administration has been pointedly unfair in dealing with Mr. Ebner, the history of this matter does show that the veteran did the best he could under the circumstances to remain in school and achieve the rehabilitation goal he had set for himself with the help of the VA. It is questionable whether it was ever made clear to Mr. Ebner that the attainment of a degree, and not employment, was the governing criterion under which he was to maintain his workload.

In addition, the committee feels that Mr. Ebner should not be punished for carrying out the instructions of Dean Click regarding the workload of classes at the University of Texas.

The committee is convinced that Dalworth C. Ebner can and will make a valuable contribution to society if he is given the opportunity for rehabilitation training. In view of the extremely heavy burdens which Mr. Ebner has been carrying in supporting himself and six other people, while being ill physically and psychologically, as a direct result of military service, the committee believes that it is obligated to help this man rehabilitate himself so that he can become sufficiently productive to support his family. The committee, therefore, recommends enactment of this legislation.

JOHN WESSELS

The committee has added to S. 299 as originally introduced an amendment for the relief of John Wessels of St. Johnsbury, Vt. The committee's amendment would enable Mr. Wessels to apply to the Veterans' Administration within 6 months from enactment of this bill for apprentice or on-the-job training in printing under chapter 33 of title 38, United States Code. If the Administrator of Veterans' Administration determines that Mr. Wessels is otherwise eligible for such training, the amendment will permit him to receive unused portion of his training benefits, notwithstanding the fact that the Veterans' Administration has heretofore determined that he changed his program of education and has thus held him ineligible for apprentice or on-the-job training benefits.

The committee approved this amendment because of special circumstances existing with respect to Mr. Wessels' application. According to the documentary evidence submitted to the committee, Mr. Wessels took training under the GI bill (Public Law 550, 82d Cong.) in a vocational course at the New Hampshire Technical Institute in Manchester, N.H., in machine shop technology. This training was approved by the Veterans' Administration on September 19, 1957. The training was to start on September 4, 1957. On October 23, 1957, the Veterans' Administration approved a change in course to a printing course through the Berlin High School at Berlin, N.H., and Mr. Wessels completed the 2-year printing program and was graduated from it as a journeyman printer in June 1959.

Evidence submitted to the committee indicated that before changing from the machinist course to the printing course, Mr. Wessels discussed his education and training with the Veterans' Administration office in Berlin, N.H., and was encouraged by them to go into the printing trade. He received excellent marks in his course and at its completion was employed by Cowles Press, Inc., at St. Johnsbury, Vt. His application for apprenticeship or on-the-job training in printing in connection with his employment was denied by the Veterans' Administration upon the ground that he had made the one permissive change in course which the present law allows. His employer and Mr. Wessels have supplied information to the committee demonstrating that his on-the-job training, relative to his present employment, would be a more specific and detailed continuation of his education and training in the printing field for which he has acquired the fundamentals under a course of education approved by the Veterans' Administration.

The committee believes that Mr. Wessels was inadvertently led to believe that he would be entitled to on-the-job and apprenticeship benefits under Veterans' Administration programs if he entered the printing trade. The committee notes that this course of training as a machinist extended only from September 4, 1957, until October 1, 1957, but that he pursued a 2-year training course in printing and is now employed in this field.

Rather clearly Mr. Wessels is now in the field of endeavor best suited to his individual aptitudes and skills. The committee therefore believes that a further upgrading of his skills, by restoring the unused portion of his veteran's training rights, would be beneficial not only to Mr. Wessels individually but also of significant benefit to the printing industry generally.

Under the circumstances which exist in this case, the committee believes that it would be inequitable to deny Mr. Wessels the benefits to which he is entitled by reason of his active military service, and has, therefore, amended the bill so as to grant relief in a situation which would otherwise be inequitable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 299) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended, so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Dalworth C. Ebner and John Wessels."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS TAX RETIREMENT ACT OF 1960

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, early in this Congress, I joined with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] in sponsoring S. 841, a bill which is similar in many respects to H.R. 10.

Prior to this action, I, like many other proponents, reviewed the history of legislation on this subject. One point above all impressed me. That was the fact that the President of the United States, the Treasury Department, and the House of Representatives all agreed that the present law does not give self-employed persons tax treatment for their retirement savings comparable with that now accorded the employees covered by the employer-financed pension plans.

The enactment of H.R. 10 is long overdue. This bill, which was first introduced in 1951 has been reported twice by the House Ways and Means Committee and has been passed by the House almost unanimously on two occasions. The Senate Finance Committee has in this Congress devoted 6 days to open hearings, and an additional 5 days were spent in executive session on this remedial legislation.

On June 9, 1960, the Senate Finance Committee reported H.R. 10 by a 12-to-5 vote. The committee in its wisdom and with the assistance of the Treasury Department modified the House-passed bill to include the secretaries, the dental assistants, the journeymen apprentices, the janitors, and others who have served their employers more than 3 years. In other words, a self-employed person would have to give his employees access to retirement benefits on a comparable basis in order to obtain these benefits himself.

While relatively few individuals will be in a position to take the maximum deduction per year, there will be many who for the first time in their business careers will be encouraged to start saving for their retirement years.

H.R. 10 now carries the endorsement of the Treasury Department and strong bipartisan support in both bodies of Congress.

I believe that this legislation, which could affect some 20 million Americans, will have the overwhelming support of this body. I urge Senators on both sides of the aisle to support this measure.

RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, unless Senators have measures which they desire to have taken up, and which might be considered at this time, I move that the Senate take a recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 57 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

At 11 o'clock and 10 minutes p.m., the Senate reassembled when called to order by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCLELLAN in the chair). The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 3319) to authorize the Administrator of General Services to release the recapture provisions contained in the conveyance of certain real property to the city of Little Rock, Ark., and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3648) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia on behalf of the United States to transfer from the United States to the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency title to certain real property in said District, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 598, 86th Congress, the Clerk was directed to respectfully return Senate Joint Resolution 217, to the Senate; and transmitted the resolution of the House (H. Res. 598) thereon, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
July, 2, 1960.

Resolved, That Senate Joint Resolution 217 in the opinion of this House contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said resolution be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

The message also announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 6 to the bill (H.R. 12740) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes, and concurred therein; that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, 9, 14, and 17 to the bill, and that the House insisted upon its amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 15.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1961

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask the Presiding Officer to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its action on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 12740.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of today.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its action on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 12740, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
July 2, 1960.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 6 to the bill (H.R. 12740) entitled "An Act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and for other purposes", and concur therein;

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, 9, 14, and 17 to said bill; and

That the House insist upon its amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 15.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate recede on amendments numbered 7, 8, 9, 14, and 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, two of these amendments related to forest highways and public land highways.

When the annual bill for the Department of Commerce and related agencies was passed by the Senate without making provision for these two items at that time, the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Florida assured all interested Senators that we would take the very first opportunity in the first supplemental bill, after the supplemental budget request reached us, to do everything we could to place those two items in the supplemental bill. I want all Senators who recall that commitment to know that we have carried it out completely. We regret that the House of Representatives has not at this time seen fit to accept these items, upon which it held hearings, and which it eliminated on a point of order. I do not understand the manipulations which have taken place in the other body, but I want the RECORD to show that the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Arizona have completely fulfilled their obligations to the Senate and to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator from Florida has made a statement in which I concur.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a summary table showing the budget estimates, the amounts recommended in the House and Senate versions of the bill, and the amounts finally agreed upon.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUTHORIZATION FOR SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS TO FILE REPORT WITH SECRETARY OF THE SENATE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Small Business be authorized, during the recess of the Congress between the dates July 2, 1960, and August 8, 1960, to file with the Secretary of the Senate a report entitled "Impact of Imports on Small Business," together with individual views and appendix, if any, and that the report be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the following bills of the Senate:

S. 2674. An act to authorize the acquisition of certain lands for addition to Harpers Ferry National Monument, and for other purposes; and

S. 3247. An act to amend the act of September 9, 1959 (73 Stat. 473), to provide that payment for the lands covered by such act may be made on a deferred basis.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2932) to amend section 3568 of title 18, United States Code, to provide for reducing sentences of imprisonment imposed upon persons held in custody for want of bail while awaiting trial by the time so spent in custody, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF SUGAR ACT OF 1948

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H.R. 12311.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H.R. 12311) to extend for 1 year the Sugar Act of 1948, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, there are pending at the desk certain amendments, which I may state.

The first one is an amendment to the title, which probably should be stated last, but it would strike out the words "extend for one year" and insert the word "amend."

That is an attempt to keep it to 1960.

It would then, on page 1, strike out, beginning on line 3, everything on that page, and over, on page 2, strike out everything through line 17.

On page 2, line 18, it would strike "SEC. 5" and insert "That."

On page 2, line 21, it would strike "1961" and insert "1960."

On page 3, lines 3 and 4, it would strike "and for calendar year 1961."

On page 4, lines 15 and 16, it would strike "shall be allocated to or" and insert "may."

On page 5, line 4, it would strike the numeral "6" and insert the numeral "2" following the word "section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer those as amendments to the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Those are amendments to the bill.

The bill extends the act for 1 year, 1960, for it requires that there be passed during the time when we are back in session in August, the extension of the Sugar Act.

It would grant the President full power, whether Congress is in session or not, to establish a sugar quota for Cuba for the remainder of 1960 at such levels as the President may from time to time believe to be in the national interest.

There are some additional provisions in the House bill. If Senators desire to discuss them, I shall be glad to do so, but if it is desired to get a sugar bill enacted before we recess, this is the only way to do it.

This proposal will grant to a number of countries, including Panama and others I cannot now recall, 10,000 short tons instead of the present provision, which gives them 3,000 tons. It provides that after that is done the Republic of the Philippines shall have 15 percent of any additional amount that is saved, if I may use that term, by reduction of the Cuban quota.

It then provides that the President may purchase whatever is remaining from some other foreign countries; but this does not become permanent or an allocable right for the future.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the bill quote the price which may be paid to other countries?

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. AIKEN. I have in mind the country of Brazil, which has had a surplus of sugar. If it were deemed necessary or feasible to purchase any of the sugar from Brazil to make up what was not coming from Cuba, would Brazil get the world market price or the price paid to the other countries?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no provision as to exact price other than the provision that the President may do the purchasing. I would think the President, having had a little experience with the purchasing of sugar, would have to meet the Cuban price in the case of a country like Brazil, and not buy it at the world price. That, however, is a matter for the President.

There are floating the world probably 500,000 tons of sugar that could be picked up if there was a shortage as a result of a reduction of Cuban sugar. I imagine the President would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to do the purchasing.

Mr. AIKEN. Brazil alone has 500,000 tons surplus, if we decided to buy it there, but it would be a rather severe blow to our foreign policy if we were to pay 3 cents a pound in the Dominican Republic and in other countries 2 cents.

Mr. ANDERSON. The matter of handling foreign policy is within the discretion of the President. I am quite sure the President would not permit the Secretary of Agriculture to do something to disturb our foreign policy.

Mr. AIKEN. Then the President would have full authority to pay the same price, in purchasing, let us say, from Brazil, as he would have to pay to the Latin American countries with quotas?

Mr. ANDERSON. The President would have authority to purchase at a price he deemed proper.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The distinguished Senator from New Mexico certainly knows the whole agricultural field well, both from his service on the committees of the Congress and from his service as Secretary of Agriculture. Does the Senator think it is more important to enact sugar legislation at this time than to enact wheat legislation?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the Senator from South Dakota has asked me a strange question. I can only say that I was not enthusiastic about the resolution of the Finance Committee. I cast a vote against it. However, I think it is important to give to the President of the United States authority to deal with the sugar situation. I recognize that the bill is now in a shape which is not the final shape I should like to see it in, but I know of no other way we can grant to the President of the United States the authority he wishes to have, which I think he needs.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, yesterday I presented to the Senate and there has been printed an amendment to the bill H.R. 12311. It is an amendment which would add to the sugar bill the wheat bill which was passed by the Senate of the United States, with some modifications in the percentage of parity support, the percentage of acreage to be withdrawn, and the payment in kind.

The Senate passed the bill providing for a 75-percent loan, while the amendment I offer would have provided 77 percent. The reduction in acreage was 20 percent in the bill as it passed the Senate, and I proposed 22 percent. The Senate-passed bill proposed a 50-percent payment in kind, and I proposed a 55-percent payment in kind.

All three of those provisions are a step or a move in the direction of the bill which seemed to have favor with the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives. In all other respects, the bill is identical with the bill which passed the Senate.

It seems to me that if the House wishes to hold to a firm position with respect to its approach to the sugar situation, possibly the Senate ought to give the House an opportunity to pass on a wheat bill.

I will say further that the wheat bill which was passed by the Senate almost passed the House. In the House, when a motion to recommit was made, the Senate-passed bill was defeated by only 16 votes. The vote was 211 to 195. A change of nine votes would have meant we would have had wheat legislation.

The Senator from South Dakota is reluctant to state that it is more important to pass sugar legislation than to pass wheat legislation, especially in view of the fact that the farmers in soft wheat areas will, before long, be making their plantings and planning for their next crop. If the House-passed sugar bill is to be presented and considered at this time, it seems to me we should consider the amendment which has been printed, which was filed yesterday, dealing with wheat.

Mr. ANDERSON. I say to the Senator from South Dakota, first, that the House did not try to pass the same bill which the Senate passed. Therefore, if we send this bill to the House with the wheat amendment added to it, we will give many Members of the House, who are anxious to "do it in," an opportunity to kill the sugar bill. That would not be the worst disaster, from my standpoint, so far as my own individual State is concerned, but the President of the United States has indicated to the Congress that he wishes to have authority to deal with the Cuban situation. I think it is far more important to give to the President the authority which he has asked for, even if we do not like the sugar bill provisions, than to load the bill with amendments which might be offensive to the whole program.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the Senator believe that if we take up general sugar legislation when we return in August there will be any opportunity at that time to give consideration to the wheat bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. The able chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is far more competent to pass on that question than I. I hope many things may be considered in August. I would certainly not wish to make any commitment as to what the fine Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will do.

When the Sugar Act extension is before the Senate—and there must be one in August—I think the Senator from South Dakota would be well within his rights to offer a wheat amendment at that time. The necessity for dealing with the Cuban situation will have passed by that time.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the amendment which I propose to offer? I shall not offer it as an amendment at this time, but I should like to have it printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE I—PRICE SUPPORT AND ALLOTMENTS

SEC. 101. Title I of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, is amended by adding the following new sections:

"SEC. 107. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 101 of this Act, for each of the 1961, 1962, and 1963 crops of wheat price support shall be made available as provided in this section. The support price for each such crop shall be 77 per centum of the parity price therefor. Price support under the foregoing provision of this section shall be made available only to cooperators, only in the commercial wheat-producing area, and only if producers have not disapproved marketing quotas for the crop. In case marketing quotas are disapproved, price support to cooperators shall be as provided in section 101(d)(3).

"(b) If marketing quotas are in effect for the particular crop of wheat, wheat of any such crop, and any other commodity produced on a farm to which a wheat marketing quota is applicable and in the calendar year in which wheat of any such crop is normally harvested, shall be eligible for price support only if—

"(1) the farm is in compliance with the farm wheat acreage allotment for such crop;

"(2) the total acreage on the farm devoted to the production of nonconserving crops as determined by the Secretary which would normally be harvested in the calendar year in which such wheat crop is normally harvested does not exceed the total average annual acreage on the farm devoted to the production of such nonconserving crops for harvest in 1958 and 1959, less an acreage equal to 22 per centum of the farm acreage allotment for such crop of wheat which would be in effect for the farm except for the reduction thereof as provided in section 334(c)(2) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended; and

"(3) the producers on the farm in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary—

"(i) designate an acreage on the farm equal to the 22 per centum reduction in the farm acreage allotment required under section 334(e)(2) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, for the particular crop of wheat, and

"(ii) do not produce any crop thereon which is normally harvested in the calendar year in which the particular crop of wheat is normally harvested and do not graze such acreage during such year.

A farm shall be deemed in compliance with the requirements of clauses (1) and (2) if no crop not subject to acreage allotments is produced on the farm for harvest, and the farm is in compliance with the farm acreage allotments. In accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, the acreage of such nonconserving crops for harvest in 1958 and 1959 may be adjusted to the extent the Secretary determines appropriate for abnormal weather conditions, established crop rotation practices for the farm, changes in the constitution of the farm, participation in soil bank or Great Plains programs, or to give effect to the provisions of law relating to release and reapportionment or preservation of history, and such other factors as the Secretary may deem appropriate. For the purposes of eligibility for price support a producer shall not be deemed to have violated any of the foregoing conditions unless the producer knowingly violated such condition, but the Secretary may provide by regulation for adjusting any payment in kind under subsection (c) or (d) on account of any violation of any such condition or any other condition of eligibility for such payment. For the purposes of this section a wheat marketing quota shall not be deemed to be applicable to any farm exempt from wheat marketing quotas under item (7) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1340 (7)) or exempt from wheat marketing penalties under section 335(f) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1335 (f)).

"(c) Producers of wheat meeting the foregoing conditions of eligibility for price support for any calendar year shall be entitled for such year to a wheat payment in kind from Commodity Credit Corporation stocks equal in value to 55 per centum of the average annual yield in bushels of wheat per harvested acre on the farm for the three years immediately preceding the year for which the designation is made, adjusted for abnormal weather conditions and as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary multiplied by the number of designated acres. Such wheat may be marketed without penalty but shall not be eligible for price support. The payment in kind shall be made by the issuance of a negotiable certificate which Commodity Credit Corporation shall redeem in wheat equal in value to the value of the certificate. The certificate shall have a value equal to the number of bushels determined as aforesaid multiplied by the basic county support rate per bushel for number one wheat of the crop normally harvested in the year for which the acreage is designated and for the county in which the designated acreage is located. The wheat redeemable for such certificate shall be valued at the market price thereof as determined by Commodity Credit Corporation. The Secretary shall provide by regulation for the sharing of a certificate among producers on the farm on a fair and equitable basis. The acreage designated under this section shall be in addition to any acreage devoted to the conservation reserve program.

"(d) If marketing quotas are in effect for the 1961 crop of wheat and the producers on the farm agree to meet the requirements of subsection (b) for 1961, 1962, and 1963, and, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary—

"(1) designate an acreage on the farm equal to not less than 22 per centum nor more than 100 per centum of the acreage allotment which would be in effect for the farm for the 1961 crop of wheat except for the reduction thereof as provided in section 334(c)(2) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, and do not produce any crop thereon which is normally harvested in the calendar years 1961, 1962, and 1963 and do not graze such acreage during such years, but devote such acreage to soil and water conserving uses;

"(2) reduce by the number of acres so designated the acreage of wheat on the farm in each such year below the acreage allotment which would be in effect for the farm for such year except for the reduction thereof as provided in section 334(c)(2) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended; and

"(3) reduce by the number of acres so designated the acreage of nonconserving crops on the farm in each such calendar year below the average annnal acreage on the farm devoted to the production of such nonconserving crops for harvest for 1958 and 1959 adjusted as provided in subsection (b), such producers shall be entitled to a wheat payment in kind, in lieu of the payment provided by subsection (c), for each such year from Commodity Credit Corporation stocks equal in value to 55 per centum of the average annual yield in bushels of wheat per harvested acre on the farm for the three years 1958 through 1960, adjusted for abnormal weather conditions and as determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, multiplied by the number of designated acres. Such wheat may be marketed without penalty but shall not be eligible for price support. The payment in kind shall be made by the issuance of a negotiable certificate which Commodity Credit Corporation shall redeem in wheat equal in value to the value of the certificate. The certificate shall have a value equal to the number of bushels determined as aforesaid multiplied by the basic county support rate per bushel for number one wheat of the crop normally harvested in the year for which the payment is made and for the county in which the designated acreage is located. The wheat redeemable for such certificate shall be valued at the market price thereof as determined by the Commodity Credit Corporation. The Secretary shall provide by regulation for the sharing of a certificate among producers on the farm on a fair and equitable basis. The share of any producer in certificates issued under this subsection with respect to any year and with respect to all farms in which he has an interest, based on the face value of the certificates, shall not exceed the greater of (1) $10,000, or (2) such producer's share of payments made under this subsection for acreage required to be designated either in 1961 or in such year as a condition of price support. If such producers fail to comply with the requirements of this subsection for all or any part of the three year period, such producers shall forfeit or refund in cash all or such part of the payments provided for by this subsection as the Secretary determines to be fair and equitable and prescribes by regulation. The acreage on any farm which is determined under regulations of the Secretary to have been diverted from the production of wheat by reason of designation under this subsection shall be considered acreage devoted to wheat for the purposes of establishing future State, county, and farm acreage allotments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. In applying the provisions of paragraph (6) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress (7 U.S.C. 1340(6)), and section 326(b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1326(b)), relating to reduction of the storage amount of wheat that part of the acreage designated under this subsection in excess of the 22 per centum reduction required under section 334(c)(2) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 on any farm shall be regarded as wheat acreage on the farm of normal production as that term is defined in section 301(b)(9) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1301(b)(9)).

"SEC. 108. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 101 or 107 of this Act or any provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, if marketing quotas are disapproved for the 1961 crop of wheat, the level of price support to cooperators and noncooperators for the 1961 crop and each subsequent crop of wheat shall be 50 per centum of the parity price of wheat and no national marketing quota or acreage allotment shall be proclaimed with respect to any subsequent crop of wheat: Provided, That if price support at 50 per centum of the parity price is in effect under this section the current price support for wheat, for the purposes of section 407 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, shall be determined on the basis of a price support level for wheat of 77 per centum of the parity price therefor."

SEC. 102. (a) Item (1) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended, is amended, effective beginning with the 1961 crop of wheat, to read as follows:

"(1) If a national marketing quota for wheat is in effect for any marketing year, farm marketing quotas shall be in effect for the crop of wheat which is normally harvested in the calendar year in which such marketing year begins. The farm marketing quota for any crop of wheat shall be the actual production of the acreage planted to such crop of wheat on the farm less the farm marketing excess. The farm marketing excess shall be an amount equal to double the normal yield of wheat per acre established for the farm multiplied by the number of acres planted to such crop of wheat on the farm in excess of the farm acreage allotment for such crop unless the producer, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary and within the time prescribed therein, establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary the actual production of such crop of wheat on the farm. If such actual production is so established the farm marketing excess shall be such actual production less the actual production of the farm wheat acreage allotment. Actual production of the farm wheat acreage allotment shall mean the actual average yield per harvested acre of wheat on the farm multiplied by the number of acres constituting the farm acreage allotment. In determining the actual average yield per harvested acre of wheat and the actual production of wheat on the farm any acreage utilized for feed without threshing after the wheat is headed, or available for such utilization at the time the actual production is determined, shall be considered harvested acreage and the production thereof in terms of grain shall be appraised in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary and such production included in the actual production of wheat on the farm. The acreage planted to wheat on a farm shall include all acreage planted to wheat for any purpose and self-seeded (volunteer) wheat, but shall not include any acreage that is disposed of prior to harvest in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

(b) Item (2) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended, is amended, effective beginning with the 1961 crop of wheat, to read as follows:

"(2) During any marketing year for which quotas are in effect, the producer shall be subject to a penalty on the farm marketing excess of wheat. The rate of the penalty shall be 65 per centum of the parity price per bushel of wheat as of May 1 of the calendar year in which the crop is harvested."

(c) Item (3) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended, is amended, effective beginning with the 1961 crop of wheat, to read as follows:

"(3) The farm marketing excess for wheat shall be regarded as available for marketing, and the penalty and the storage amount or amounts of wheat to be delivered to the Secretary shall be computed upon double the normal production of the excess acreage. If the farm marketing excess so computed is adjusted downward on the basis of actual production, the difference between the amount of the penalty or storage computed on the basis of double the normal production and as computed on actual production shall be returned to or allowed the producer or a corresponding adjustment made in the amount to be delivered to the Secretary if the producer elects to make such delivery. The Secretary shall issue regulations under which the farm marketing excess of wheat for the farm shall be stored or delivered to him. Upon failure to store, or deliver to the Secretary, the farm marketing excess within such time as may be determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary the penalty computed as aforesaid shall be paid by the producer. Any wheat delivered to the Secretary hereunder shall become the property of the United States and shall be disposed of by the Secretary for relief purposes in the United States or foreign countries or in such other manner as he shall determine will divert it from the normal channels of trade and commerce."

(d) Item (7) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1340 (7)), is amended to read as follows:

"(7) A farm marketing quota on any crop of wheat shall not be applicable to any farm on which the acreage planted to wheat for such crop does not exceed fifteen acres: Provided, however, That a farm marketing quota on the 1961 and subsequent crops of wheat shall be applicable to—

"(i) any farm on which the acreage of wheat exceeds the smaller of (1) twelve acres or (2) the highest number of acres planted to wheat on the farm for harvest in the calendar years 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959, or 1960; and

"(ii) any farm on which any wheat is planted if any of the producers who share in the wheat produced on such farm share in the wheat produced on any other farm."

(e) Item (12) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended (7 U.S.C. 1340(12)), is repealed, effective beginning with the 1961 crop of wheat.

(f) Section 326(b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended, effective beginning with the 1961 crop of wheat, to read as follows:

"(b) If a farm is in compliance with its farm acreage allotment for any crop of wheat and the actual production of such crop of wheat on the farm is less than the normal production of the farm wheat acreage allotment, an amount equal to the deficiency may be marketed without penalty from wheat of previous crops stored by the producers on the farm to postpone the payment of marketing quota penalties."

SEC. 103. The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended as follows:

(a) Section 334 is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(c)" and adding a new subparagraph (2) following subparagraph (c) (1) to read as follows:

"(2) Nothwithstanding any other provision of law, each old or new farm acreage allotment for the 1961 and subsequent crops of wheat as determined on the basis of a minimum national acreage allotment of fifty-five million acres shall be reduced by 22 per centum. In the event notices of farm acreage allotments for the 1961 crop of wheat have been mailed to farm operators prior to the effective date of this subparagraph (2) new notices showing the required reduction shall be mailed to farm operators as soon as practicable."

(b) Section 334(e) is amended to read as follows:

"(e) If, with respect to any crop of wheat, the Secretary determines that the production of any kind of wheat will be inadequate to provide a sufficient quantity of that kind of wheat to satisfy the demand therefor, the wheat acreage allotment (and the number of acres which may be planted under item (7) (i) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, without making a farm marketing quota applicable to the farm) for such crop for each farm located in a county which has produced such wheat for commercial food products during one or more of the five years immediately preceding the year in which such crop is harvested, shall be increased by such uniform percentage as he deems necessary to provide for such quantity. No increase shall be made under this subsection in the wheat acreage allotment of any farm (or in the acreage which may be planted without making a farm marketing quota applicable to the farm) for any crop if any kind of wheat other than that for which the increase is made is planted on such farm for such crop. Any increases in wheat acreage allotments authorized by this subsection shall be in addition to the National, State, and county wheat acreage allotments, and such increases shall not be considered in establishing future State, county, and farm allotments. The provisions of paragraph (6) of Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress (7 U.S.C. 1340(6)), and section 326(b) of this Act, relating to the reduction of the storage amount of wheat shall apply to the allotment for the farm established without regard to this subsection and not to the increased allotment under this subsection, except that any farm in compliance with its increased allotment under this subsection shall be considered in compliance with its farm acreage allotment for the purposes of said section 326(b). Any farm receiving an increased allotment under this subsection shall be excused from complying with clauses (2) and (3) of section 107(b) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 to the extent deemed appropriate by the Secretary to provide for the increase in allotment under this subsection, and no farm on which acreage is designated pursuant to section 107(b)(3) or 107(d) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 in a greater amount than required as a condition of price support for any crop shall be eligible for an increased allotment under this subsection for such crop."

(c) Subsection (f) of section 335 is amended by striking out the semicolon at the end of item (1) and adding "and shall not apply to other farms with respect to the 1961 and subsequent crops;".

(d) Section 336 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 336. Between the date of issuance of any proclamation of any national marketing quota for wheat and July 25 of the year in which the proclamation is made the Secretary shall conduct a referendum by secret ballot to determine whether farmers favor or oppose such quota. Farmers eligible to vote in such referendum shall be farmers who were engaged in the production of the crop of wheat normally harvested in the calendar year immediately preceding the calendar year in which the referendum is held on a farm in the commercial wheat-producing area for such crop and on which more than twelve acres was planted to wheat of such crop if such crop was the 1961, 1962, or 1963 crop, or on which more than fifteen acres was planted to wheat of such crop if such crop was any crop other than the 1961, 1962, or 1963 crop. Any acreage considered as being devoted to wheat in establishing future allotments under applicable provisions of law shall be considered as wheat-producing acreage for the purpose of determining eligibility to vote. If the Secretary determines that more than one-third of the farmers voting in the referendum oppose such quota he shall prior to the effective date of such quota by proclamation suspend the operation of the national marketing quotas with respect to wheat."

(e) Section 362 is amended by deleting the second sentence thereof.

(f) Subsections (b) and (c) of section 335 are hereby repealed and subsection (d) of said section is repealed effective beginning with the 1961 crop of wheat.

(g) The first proviso of section 377 is amended by striking out "Provided, That beginning with the 1960 crop" and inserting in lieu thereof "Provided, That beginning with the 1964 crop in the case of wheat and the 1960 crop in the case of any other commodity".

SEC. 104. Section 101(d) of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, is amended by—

(A) striking out paragraph (5); and

(B) amending paragraph (7) to read as follows:

"(7) No price support shall be made available for any crop of wheat for which acreage allotments are not in effect and no price support shall be made available for any crop of wheat in any State designated under section 335(e) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, as outside the commercial wheat-producing area for such crop.".

TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO GREAT PLAINS PROGRAM

SEC. 201. Section 16 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended as follows:

(1) Paragraph (3) of subsection (b) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) insofar as the acreage of cropland on any farm enter into the determination of acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, the cropland acreage on the farm shall not be decreased during the period of any contract heretofore or hereafter entered into under this subsection by reason of any action taken for the purpose of carrying out such contract and, under regulations of the Secretary, shall not be decreased, for such period after the expiration of the contract as is equal to the period of the contract, by reason of the the maintenance of any change in land use from cultivated cropland to permanent vegetation carried out under the contract;"

(2) Paragraph (4) of subsection (b) is amended to read as follows:

"(4) the acreage on any farm which is determined under regulations of the Secretary to have been diverted from the production of any commodity subject to acreage allotments or marketing quotas in order to carry out any contract heretofore or hereafter entered into under the program or in order to maintain, for such period after the expiration of the contract as is equal to the period of the contract, any change in land use from cultivated cropland to permanent vegetation carried out under the contract shall be considered acreage devoted to the commodity for the purposes of establishing future State, county, and farm acreage allotments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended;".

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New Mexico a couple of questions, inasmuch as the amendments were not printed.

Is it the intent of the amendments that the bill shall contain powers granted to the President for the calendar year 1960 to deal with the Cuban situation, but not to extend the Sugar Act beyond its present expiration date?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Nebraska has stated the situation correctly. There are some additional provisions.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand.

Mr. ANDERSON. Those relate to the 1960 situation, for the Philippines and some other countries.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Nebraska has stated the purpose of the amendments correctly.

Mr. CURTIS. I appreciate the Senator's yielding to me. I shall not take a great deal of time. I merely wish to say that I believe the Senate should insist upon the right to legislate on the sugar problem. I hope the other body will send us a bill before the closing days of the August session.

Mr. MORSE and Mr. BENNETT addressed the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to have the floor in my own right.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should be happy to yield the floor.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is it not correct to say that the bill which came from the House would attempt to deal with allocating quotas for next year, and that the compromise now being presented to the Senate would deal only with the allocation of the deficit which might result from action taken by the President in cutting off imports from Cuba?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. What we attempt to do is to provide some limitation under which the President must allocate or must purchase sugar to make up the deficit which may result if we cut off imports from Cuba?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think I would rather have the Senator use the terminology under which the President may purchase sugar, rather than allocate it.

Mr. McCARTHY. The President may purchase sugar.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is a determination as to the proportion the President may purchase.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. We shall return in August and deal with the question of the allocation of quotas, domestic, and foreign, for the fiscal year 1961, and possibly for future years.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think this is a very good compromise. I represent a State which I think has at least the fifth largest beet sugar acreage, some 80,000 acres, and I believe this compromise for the rest of the year 1960 should be agreed to.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would this provision apply to other countries outside of Cuba, so far as quotas are concerned?

Mr. ANDERSON. There would be some change outside of Cuba under the House bill. It provides that five of the very small countries will be given an increase from 3,000 to 10,000 tons. That was provided in the House bill. There is a provision for the Philippines.

In a general sense, the Senator is correct. There is no real change, except as savings are to be made because of the Cuban reduction.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Following up the question asked by the Senator from Vermont, would this apply to new countries, that is, countries now not under the quota system? Could it apply to them?

Mr. ANDERSON. The President is allowed to buy from the countries having quotas. Then there is language that if additional amounts of sugar are required the President may authorize the purchase of such amounts from any foreign country, without allocation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. At his discretion?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is in the discretion of the President.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BENNETT. I should like to make a brief statement with respect to the Sugar Act. I had a great deal to do with the resolution which was offered yesterday and which was amended today before it was sent over to the House and then rejected. The language of that resolution was largely taken from page 3 of the bill, so the language we are sending over to the House is the approximate language that we would have sent over if we had not stricken it out of our own resolution before it went over, with the exception of the priorities set up in limiting the right of the President to acquire sugar to make up any deficit created by any action with respect to Cuba.

The Senator from Utah is perfectly willing to accept the proposal of the Senator from New Mexico as the best kind of solution we can get under the circumstances, but he wishes to make perfectly clear that in making this decision, we are giving up the sugar bill we had before us, and we are making it necessary for the House to act again on another sugar bill before the Senate acts, or for the Senate to attach sugar legislation on some bill that may come to us from the Ways and Means Committee rather than from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Before I yield, I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I subscribe to what he has said. I recognize the situation in which the action proposed would put the Senate, and I agree with the Senator from Utah that it would be an undesirable position. The Senator from Utah asked me a number of times for assurances that I was unable to give him. I am informed that there are now on the Senate Calendar measures pertaining to revenue that originated in the House Ways and Means Committee, that have passed the House, and have been reported by the Senate Finance Committee, and if in the wisdom of that committee they decide that they wish to evolve a sugar bill when we return in August, they could offer whatever bill the committee reported as an amendment to Order No. 1679, H.R. 9962——

Mr. BENNETT. Or any other measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There are two or three measures. There are Calendar No. 1820, H.R. 5054, Calendar No. 1678, H.R. 10, Calendar No. 1679, H.R. 9662, and Calendar No. 1638. I do not think the Senate has given up the right to legislate in view of the fact that we have these bills on the calendar and in view of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BENNETT. If the leader has checked with the House so that we in the Senate may be sure that if we add a sugar bill to one of the bills which the Senator from Texas cited to us, and send it back to the House, the House would not then rule it out of order because it was not attached to a bill that originated in the House Agriculture Committee, that is some assurance. That is the point that worries the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We have bills from the Committee on Agriculture, too, I am informed, which we could add to a House bill, and that would be in order.

Mr. BENNETT. With this legislative history, I think members of the Finance Committee could go to work on a sugar bill as soon as they return in August and at least be prepared when we find a suitable vehicle to carry the proposed legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I certainly hope that what the Senator from Utah states would be the case.

Mr. BENNETT. I would assume that the majority leader would work with the committee to make it possible.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Utah may be sure of my cooperation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from New Mexico knows that I am not a member of the Finance Committee, and therefore could not have the grasp of this legislation which the Senator has. I would like to have him advise me, however, if I am correct in my understanding that, unless the President is given the power he has requested, during the interim between now and the return of Congress it might well be that two things would happen:

First, that from Cuban sources there might be sent to this country—and undoubtedly there will be sent—large shipments of sugar which would both disrupt the domestic market and also tend to fill, or might even completely fill, the Cuban quota for the year 1960.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think that statement is correct. I think such a view has been borne out by testimony given, at least to me, by people who I know are fully conversant with the sugar situation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Second, is it not possible that if not given power to act, the President might have to stand by supinely and see the allocation of sugar to Cuba to be furnished in 1960 raised or increased by reason of the assignment to Cuba under present law of certain deficits that will occur in the near future?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Therefore, without the passage of such legislation, at least two things with reference to the supply of sugar to this Nation might happen that would be highly favorable to Cuba which might not be within the best interests of this country.

Mr. ANDERSON. I agree thoroughly with the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a brief statement, I should like to say that my State, as the Senator knows, produces some cane sugar. We have a very real interest in this subject. But I am very certain that the sugar-producing industry of my State would not want such situations as I have just outlined in my questions, and as have been substantiated by the Senator from New Mexico, to continue to exist for failure of the Congress to pass legislation requested by the President. While this legislation far from fulfills the expectations of the sugar industry of my State, and I am sure of the sugar industry of the Nation, I feel that the Senate should adopt the amendment so ably presented by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I merely wish to extend to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico my earnest and sincere congratulations and commendation for the great and patriotic service he has rendered in presenting these amendments to the Senate this evening.

I sat in some of the conferences that led up to the amendments, merely in the capacity of an amanuensis, or to discuss rules and draftmanship. I know that the Senator from New Mexico is not at all happy about the proposed legislation, but he is offering these amendments in the national interest. I say that when we are faced with a situation such as confronts this country today from the meanderings of his mind and the exercise of the great power that has fallen into the hands of Fidel Castro, it is high time that the Congress should give to the President of the United States the authority to show that this country does not appreciate the constant attacks made and the slander heaped upon us by the man who at the present time is in control of the power of government in Cuba.

The Senator has rendered many services over many years, but I do not think anyone has ever shown a finer spirit of patriotism than has the Senator by submerging his own personal views and bringing these amendments before us this evening. I hope the Senate will agree to them.

So far as I am concerned, I think that patience has ceased to be a virtue in dealing with the present situation in Cuba, and I hope the President of the United States will exercise the powers granted to him in the national interest, and to show the way our people feel about the constant heaping upon us of abuse and slander.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I fully concur in the observations made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia. I have sat in the conferences, and I know the Senator from New Mexico is not half satisfied with this matter. I may say that the distinguished Senator from Utah, who comes from a sugar area, is not entirely satisfied. He has also rendered yeoman service in this field. I think I can tell the Senate with some authority that the bill would be acceptable to the Executive and it would be signed. It is not all we want, but it does give an opportunity to work our will in this matter when we return after the recess in August.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I desire to ask the distinguished Senator from New Mexico if H.R. 12311, as passed by the House, did not provide that of the new production gained by cutting Cuba's sugar quota, 75 percent would be allocated to new domestic production in areas in this country.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Do the amendments offered by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico cut out that 75 percent?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, they do.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Under that explanation, that may be allocated back to the domestic areas which can use it; in other words, to the old domestic areas. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. No. I do not believe it would be allocated back to existing areas. We have eliminated all of section 4. It relates to 1960.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I fully concur with the distinguished Senator from Georgia with reference to protecting America from Fidel Castro.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator will stay with me in August, we will give fits to Castro, but this is not the time to do it.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Does the House bill give him fits?

Mr. ANDERSON. This is not the time.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. What would the amendments of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico do except take quotas away from one area in the United States and give them to another?

Mr. ANDERSON. They do not touch the areas in the United States in that respect.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Seventy-five percent of the production is taken out of the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but we are not trying to reallocate the American crop, or I would be here another 6 weeks on this bill.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Wherein do the amendments change the situation one iota insofar as Cuba is concerned?

Mr. ANDERSON. They permit the reduction of the Cuban quota for 1960. We cannot change the amount of sugarbeets that have been planted.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Does not the House bill permit a reduction in the Cuban quota?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I should like to adopt the whole House bill. I favored it, but, unfortunately, I was in a minority, as so frequently happens in this world.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I concur with the opinion of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. I, too, want the House bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. We cannot get it tonight.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I regret that we cannot get it.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I fully appreciate the service rendered by the Senator from New Mexico with respect to the parliamentary situation which has arisen on the floor of the Senate as a result of the procedure we followed in sending to the House, in the first instance, the sugar resolution.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from New Mexico has once again performed a great service for the Senate.

However, I approach the result of this latest conference between the House and the Senate with many reservations. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from New Mexico as I raise a point or two which causes me to have these reservations.

We have provisions in this final proposal which seriously affect the foreign policy of the United States. Some of us in the Committee on Foreign Relations have concerned ourselves very much with this problem. I speak as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Relations. I am very much concerned about the House proposal.

It proceeds to allocate, with regard to certain countries, the sugar quota. I do not care whether one says in reply, "But we are going to apply it only in 1960." We are putting a foot in the door.

In each of these countries, once we adopt the specifics of the resolution, the people of those countries will be led to believe that we have started a policy that will live on. If we decide to change the policy, we will have to confront those countries with a reversal in the months immediately ahead. It is a great mistake to have the specifics—if I am correct in my understanding as to the existence of these specifics—in relation to countries such as Costa Rica, the Netherlands, or Nationalist China. In my capacity as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee I have been bombarded by representatives of some Latin American countries who are very much concerned about what the House has done.

This is a foreign-policy matter. It is a matter that should have been gone into thoroughly by the Committee on Foreign Relations and by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, rather than in the way we are proceeding here tonight, without the evidence we ought to have as to the effect the bill might have upon our foreign relations and on our American foreign policy.

I would be agreeable to giving authority for a temporary period so that advice could be obtained from the State Department, which, in turn, would be able to confer with the Foreign Relations Committee and with the Committee on Foreign Affairs. However, for us to go ahead, without the benefit of knowing what the foreign-relations effect of the allocations contained in the bill will be to disrupt, as I think we will disrupt, some of our foreign relations with Latin American countries, is a great mistake at this late hour. I wish we had before us a bill which would not change these allocations quite in the specifics that this one does in relation to any other country. I wish we would keep open to a greater extent, as pointed out by the Senator from Texas, our own domestic policy.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If I understand the summary of the proposition before us, would it not mean that this enormous quota for Cuba, which is 90 percent of all the purchases of sugar from areas outside the United States, would be allocated to countries which presently are selling us sugar and which are called full-duty countries—I think they have about a quarter of a cent more duty than Cuba—and that they would be selling us sugar at about twice the world market price?

Mr. ANDERSON. That has been going on for many years. They have been selling sugar at the prevailing price and not at the lower price. It is true that the countries in the Caribbean areas have been marketing sugar at a lower price than we pay Cuba.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. This is a $150 million economic aid program. Once we give this profit to these countries, does not the Senator realize that they will regard it as being an unfriendly act on our part when we take it away? If we went ahead and purchased the sugar at the world market price, would we not be better off to go ahead and do that than to assign quotas to those countries?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. And when we tried to take it away, they would try to construe it as economic warfare.

Mr. MORSE. Yes. I am thinking of the foreign relations effects of this bill.

The Senator from Louisiana could not be more correct than he is. What is being done, in effect, really, is to set up new quotas for some countries. Subsequently we will put ourselves in a position where there may be an attempt by some countries to say that we are going to change the quotas. We will be creating much ill will.

What we ought to be doing is to pass a simple measure, for the time being, that will give the President of the United States authority to decide what ought to be done for this temporary period, in connection with the Cuban quota, and then to wait until the Committee on Foreign Relations can hold hearings on the subject.

We can then consider the effect on our Latin American policy, rather than to pass a bill which may cause resentment in some of the capitals of our best friends in Latin America.

Consider Brazil, for example. If there is any country in which we ought to be seeking to create more good will, it is Brazil. But the action we are taking tonight will arouse deep animosity in Brazil.

Consider Venezuela, another great sugar-producing country. We do not know for certain tonight which way Venezuela will go. Yet we are proceeding to follow a course of action which will permit the radical and Communist elements in Venezuela to utter some vicious propaganda to the effect that once again the United States slaps its Latin American friends in the face and sets up some preferences.

Colombia, Guatemala, El Salvador, and Ecuador, also are concerned in this.

How can we define, when we come to discuss the facts and consider giving some countries sugar quotas in this proposal, whether we are not really giving preference to some other countries?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Under part 3 of the memorandum, 85 percent of the Cuban quota is to be assigned to certain so-called full duty countries in proportion to what they are now getting. Can the Senator tell me what percentage, if Cuba is eliminated, will go to Mexico?

Mr. MORSE. I cannot tell the Senator.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Would it not be around 25 percent? Or what percentage would it be? Can some Senator tell us that?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Louisiana is discussing the analysis of the full House bill for 1961. We have eliminated that.

The Senator from Oregon asked me about Brazil. We have made provision that the President may provide for certain countries, whereas we have tried to protect other countries, just as the Senator from Oregon is suggesting.

If the Senator will read the bill as amended, he will find his analysis is incorrect.

Mr. MORSE. I think the Senator is proving to me the danger of passing on foreign policy questions in this manner in the Senate. What we ought to be passing is a simple measure to freeze the matter in the hands of the President for short period of time which will elapse until we come back in August to legislate upon the Cuban sugar quota.

I ask the Senator from New Mexico whether or not in the proposal which has come back from the House we have not continued, in effect, the provision that, in regard to this year's Cuban quota, we are going to raise for nations producing between 3,000 and 5,000 tons a sufficient quantity of sugar to bring them up to 10,000 tons.

Mr. ANDERSON. That was in the House bill and was left in that bill.

Mr. MORSE. That is what I am criticizing.

Mr. ANDERSON. The next item relates to the Philippines. They get a 15-percent increase. But in line 15, in place of "shall" we have inserted "may." We struck out the words "allocated to or" and have allowed the President to differentiate between countries which have quotas and countries which have no quotas at all. So it is a matter of discretion in which the President would follow the recommendations of the Secretary of State.

This is a temporary device. That is why the temporary provision has been included.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from New Mexico does not change the situation by calling the measure a temporary device. By still permitting an increase in the quota to the five nations, there will be created an expectation in those nations that they will continue to get the new quota. If they do not continue to get it, they may construe it as a reversal of our policy. This will not create good will.

By establishing such quotas for a short period of time, we will stir up the resentments to which I have referred. I think that to do this is a mistake. We do not need to go into these specifics, however, in any measure we pass tonight.

If we would but pass a simple, general bill which would vest for a temporary period of time—until Congress returns and decides what the sugar policy will be—the authority in the President of the United States to distribute the Cuban quota, this is all that would be needed. We ought to be adopting a simple measure. Then when we return in August, we can decide what we want to do about the question.

If we let the President decide, on the basis of an Executive approach to this matter, without any specifics mentioned in any legislation passed by Congress, we will not find ourselves in such a position as to lead people in other countries to say, "But by congressional act, you put your stamp of approval—at least for a period of time—on the percentage of distribution of quotas to certain countries."

I say most respectfully that, as we are proceeding tonight, we will create much trouble in the future for ourselves among the countries which will come into the plan, even for the temporary period of the application of the bill. We will be creating great trouble for ourselves in countries which are left out of the measure.

I do not know whether my suggestion can be worked out in a parliamentary way or not. My suggestion is that we offer as a substitute for this bill a simple bill which, in effect, will say that we are placing authority in the hands of the President, for a short period of time, in order to administer the Cuban quota.

Mr. ANDERSON. That was one of the earlier suggestions which was made. I found it was completely impossible to have it agreed to, because of the position in the House at this late hour.

With reference to the size of the quotas to the respective countries, I call attention to the fact that in the Sugar Act of 1948 we were confronted with the problem of what to do about the Philippines. The Secretary of Agriculture tried to work out a proper way to handle the surplus left in the Philippines. The final decision was that it would be assigned to various countries. Other countries got it on a temporary basis. It was taken back later without any difficulty.

This proposal will become operative only when the President acts. The President will then have considerable ability to transfer the quotas almost where he sees fit, when that day comes.

We tried to retain some of the House language, because we thought that was the only way a decision might be reached on the question.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon as to the reference to other foreign countries, as stated on page 4 of the bill. Subparagraph 1 of the analysis which was submitted to the Senate by the Senator from New Mexico, contains a provision to allocate to five foreign countries so much of the unallocated sugar quota. Which foreign countries are involved in that reference in each instance? May they be named, so that the Senate will be fully informed?

Mr. MORSE. As I understand, the countries are Costa Rica, Haiti, Panama, the Netherlands, and Nationalist China.

Mr. HRUSKA. If as a result of legislative action an allocation is made to them, it will be a far different situation to withdraw from that arrangement as contrasted with the situation where perhaps the placement of a reduction of the quota of Cuba by Executive order would present if we were called upon then to correct the Executive order. Is that the point of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MORSE. Yes; it will not create nearly so much bad will or ill will as might be the case if Congress tonight puts its stamp of approval upon the specifics of the proposed legislation.

We are giving blanket authority to the President to act for a temporary period, with due notice that when we return in August we will decide on legislation as to the final allocation to be adopted by Congress.

It seems to me that what we are doing is to place ourselves in a weakened legislative position. It can be thrown into our faces that after all, on July 2 Congress took this course of action; and Congress will have to retreat from it if we are to make any change.

We do not have much of the information which we need in order to pass that judgment tonight. We should not reach that judgment, in my opinion, because of the effects it is already producing and the protests we are already receiving from some of the embassies.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLELLAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Nebraska has again read from the mimeographed analysis of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives; but the analysis which now has been placed upon the desks of many Senators is an analysis of the bill as previously passed by the House of Representatives, but is not an analysis of the bill as it has since been amended by the House.

Yesterday, in the Finance Committee, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY] and I opposed the reporting of the resolution, as joined in by many Members.

I had intended, if the bill came back from the House, to join in the effort to get the Senate to accept the full House bill.

We had conferences on this matter; and, in that connection, I should like to join in praising the participation on the part of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT]. We realized we could not get everything we wanted, and that the House could not get everything it wanted. So parts of the House bill were stricken out. Therefore, parts of the mimeographed analysis which has been placed on the desks of Senators no longer apply.

Mr. HRUSKA. But the portion referred to in No. 1 on page 4 still applies; does it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct; but that is only a portion of the allocation which might be saved from the Cuban supply if the President chooses to follow that course and it will apply only for the remaining months of this year.

Mr. HRUSKA. Yes; but if that were done by the President, that would be an Executive determination, as opposed to a legislative determination.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but I can only say that the same remark applies to the Sugar Act of 1948.

Mr. HRUSKA. Not at all; the Sugar Act of 1948 was a legislative determination, not an Executive determination.

As the Senator from Oregon has pointed out, this bill, if enacted as it is now, would deprive the Senate of the opportunity to participate in a legislative determination; and, instead, the matter would be handled by means of an Executive determination. Certainly that is demonstrated by the terms of paragraph No. 1 on page 4; whereas, if the proposal of the Senator from Oregan [Mr. MORSE] is followed, the determination which will be made will be an Executive determination as to where the Cuban allocation will be allocated; and for Congress than to overturn that Executive decision would be different from having the executive branch overturn what the legislative branch at a previous time had determined.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think time will prove that the Senator from Nebraska is unanswerably correct in the position he has taken tonight. I think he has outlined the course of action which the Senate should take.

Mr. President, I now propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from New Mexico says the approach I propose—namely, a simple measure to give the President authority for an interim period of time, in order to allow him to make the decisions in regard to the Cuban quota—could not be adopted. Do I correctly understand that situation is because of some parliamentary rule which confronts the Senate—for instance, some rule which would prevent the Senate from modifying the House proposal to the extent of striking out all the language it would be necessary to strike out, and substituting a general bill of the type I have outlined—or is it simply because we cannot obtain the agreement of the House to such a proposal?

Mr. ANDERSON. I cannot say what the House will do or will not do. I was a Member of the House, and I have great respect for it and for the institution itself.

I only say I went to the House, and tried to find out whether an agreement is possible. It is my position that if what the Senator suggests were done, and if such a provision were put into the bill, the House would not receive it. I am sure that is the position of the Speaker and of the majority leader and of the minority leader. And under those circumstances, I do not think it would be wise.

Mr. MORSE. In view of this it is easy for me to decide on what my position should be. I do not propose to vote for a mistaken foreign policy on the part of my country simply because at the 11th hour the House has taken a mistaken position. Under the circumstances, I think we should take sufficient time to study the matter and to arrive at a careful determination of a better foreign policy, rather than this one, which seems to be due to a type of pressure the House of Representatives is attempting to put on the Senate.

I repeat that I think it would do great harm to American policy in Latin America, if the measure in its present form were to be enacted. I shall vote against it because in my judgment if we were to take the action now proposed, we would have to return to this record in the not too distant future, in connection with American relationships with Latin America, and would realize that a sad mistake had been made.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Vermont, who serves with me on the Latin American Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I, too, wish to say that if the proposal as submitted to us tonight is enacted and if the President takes any action under it before we rewrite the legislation, we shall simply be piling up a great deal of trouble for ourselves.

Mr. MORSE. There is no question about it.

Mr. AIKEN. And much more trouble than we are in now, insofar as sugar is concerned.

But if the President did not take any action under it before the bill was rewritten, perhaps no harm would be done.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at this time I shall yield the floor. But I give notice that later I intend to take the floor again to offer the kind of measure which I think the Senate should adopt.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Perhaps I should address the question to the Senator from New Mexico: Do I correctly understand that we cannot amend the House bill, which has come to us by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the language of the resolution the Senate sent to the House this afternoon?

Mr. ANDERSON. Surely, we can do that.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from New Mexico believes that the House would reject such an amendment?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. My understanding, I may say, is that the reason why the House said it rejected the resolution was that it was an independent resolution of the Senate which violated the constitutional provision that revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives; but the House did not take the position that it would refuse to accept the language in the Senate resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. I spent a considerable amount of time——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not know; I have not been in the conference with the House. But I see no reason why we could not amend the House bill, and leave on it the House bill number, but proceed to substitute for the language of the bill which originated in the House the language of the Senate resolution which the Senate sent to the House. Then the measure would still be the House bill, which we would then send to the House, and we would include in the House bill that Senate amendment.

I do not understand that there could be any possible objection under the Constitution if the Senate were to proceed in that way.

If the House then should refuse to accept that Senate amendment, that would be the responsibility of the House.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, that is what I propose to do, and I propose to ascertain whether the House will reject it. From the standpoint of the foreign policy, I believe that course will at least put the monkey on the back of the House so to speak, rather than on our own back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A moment ago the Senator from Oregon propounded a parliamentary inquiry. Does he waive that inquiry?

Mr. MORSE. No, Mr. President; I should like to have a ruling by the Chair, through the Parliamentarian.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the parliamentary inquiry, of course the Senate could take the action the Senator has discussed; there is nothing to preclude the taking of such action by the Senate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, temporarily, I yield the floor.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, for once I find myself fairly well in agreement with the Senator from Oregon.

Following the many speeches I have heard in the Senate and in the other House about the leadership of the executive branch of the Government, tonight we have a chance to give the President an opportunity to exert that leadership. I have heard many speeches on this floor about wanting a strong foreign policy; and the President has asked, for 6 months, for exactly the powers the Senate tried to give him today.

The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] very, very well pointed out that this adds some benefits to Cuba. It also adjusts other quotas, and it adjusts them at a time when not one Member of this body has had a chance—or hardly any Member of this body—when not more than a handful of Senators have had a chance to read the House committee report. I do not think it is even available in the Senate, and I wager that not half a dozen Senators have had an opportunity to read this House committee report, and that even fewer have had a chance to read the House bill as it is now amended.

So, Mr. President, what are we asked to do here, tonight?

Is it such a simple thing to legislate on something that affects all of our cane growers and sugar beet growers in the United States, and to adjust quotas among a lot of our friends and our allies? I am not sure but that the Dominican Republic would also get a windfall, as I read the measure and as I read section 202(c) of the code. All of those things, to me, are bad.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not believe the Senator intended to omit that what is being done is engaging in a great decision of foreign policy as it affects the present regime in Cuba.

Mr. ALLOTT. I have not got to that yet, but I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. President, if anyone thinks that authorities in the Senate believe that this does not adjust the quotas between our friends and that we are thereby inviting trouble, if anyone thinks this will not result in a windfall to the Dominican Republic if the President exercises his authority, I would like to get that straightened out.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I believe the Senator has not seen or heard the words in the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, which make it unnecessary for any windfall to the Dominican Republic or any of the other nations who have quotas. Those words are on lines 15 and 16 on page 4 of the printed bill. The word "shall" on line 15 is changed to "may," and the words "allocated to or" are stricken, so that it reads "may be purchased from foreign countries."

The reason for that change, I happen to know, because I was present when the Senator from New Mexico suggested it, was to leave it entirely to the Executive whether or not he should distribute to any quota country, including the Dominican Republic, any of the sugar purchases which are to be made if the quota of Cuba is adversely affected.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the Senator. I do have that amendment in my hand, and I have it exactly as he read it. I believe that is possible, also. It is also possible that, instead of approaching this in a clear manner, it is giving the President power to readjust quotas as between various countries. That, I think, is a power which the Congress should surrender very reluctantly.

I am in favor, and have supported from the first, a bill which would give the President power to cut the Cuban quota and to purchase, if necessary, on the world market, or other places, sugar necessary to fill the needs of this country, to pick up the deficits of Puerto Rico and Hawaii, and allocate those to the farmers of the United States.

I see no reason why the farmers of the United States should bear the burden of this matter any longer, and I realize that while this bill has been a limitation upon them, it has also been a great protection to them.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. It cannot be denied that this legislation affects foreign policy, but certainly we should never put it in the perspective that it is not something very important to our domestic policy; and it should be determined in that light. We have a great agricultural problem in this country. We are plagued with surpluses. We are buying 98 percent of our sugar from foreign sources. Congress should assert its jurisdiction over this matter and assert itself.

Mr. ALLOTT. I appreciate the Senator's comments very much.

I would like to say something about foreign policy. Ninety miles south of this country we saw develop after New Year's Day of 1959 a dictatorship which is every bit as bad as or worse than that which existed under Batista. It is worse because when the people follow a revolutionary leader to get freedom, they find complete disillusionment. Their financial situation in Cuba is rapidly leading them on the road to chaos. Whether it will be tomorrow, or next month, or the end of this year, no one knows, but it will come.

In addition, we in this country have seen the lands of Americans expropriated day after day after day, and the only thing any American has seen for those lands has been a promise that they will be redeemed in 20-year bonds. So far as I know, no one has received a bond. Many Americans find it difficult to get even a receipt for the lands expropriated. They call it intervention now.

That is what they are doing. What would happen in this country if we sought to take the house or the property or the business of a Cuban in this country, whether he was a citizen or not? Our own people would rise in anger. Yet, somehow, we pull down a curtain before us when we look at other situations, and become blind, and cannot realize the moral implications involved.

The reason why I am speaking now is that I firmly believe the situation in Cuba poses one of the most serious threats to us and our foreign policy that has existed in this country for many years. I say we cannot—we must not—let a Communist cell grow into a well-organized Communist country there. If we do, we will be the most foolhardy people who ever existed upon the face of this earth, because we have hundreds of examples which we see around us day by day.

We are spending $41 billion this year in defense expenditures. We are spending $4 billion more in mutual security. I do not know how many billions we have spent in the last few years to stop communism. Yet we are letting it grow right under our eyes.

So the question boils down to this: The House has been adamant—I think unnecessarily so.

As a practical person, reluctantly—I say reluctantly, because I am prepared to stay here and talk all night and into tomorrow, if necessary—I would take the measure as it now comes to us. I think it is a great mistake, and I do not depreciate in any way the effects which have been made by the gentlemen who were conferring and trying to work this matter out.

However, I do say it is a poor substitute, and we in the Senate tonight—and this is what I regret most of all—have been put in a situation of accepting a take-it-or-leave-it proposition. For a year and a half a bill has been before the House Agriculture Committee to extend the Sugar Quota Act.

For a year and a half. I know every effort has been made by many people to move the legislation this year. It was commonly thought and accepted that we were going to adjourn this weekend. Perhaps we should have shook our heads a little bit. Anyway, that is what many thought.

So we reach the day before the supposed date of adjournment, 2 days before the 4th of July, a little over a week before the convention of one of our major political parties, which we recognize all of our colleagues must attend, as we on this side shall have to attend our convention, and we are suddenly faced with a bill upon a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

The bill has not gone to the committee. It has not been to the Finance Committee yet. It has been lying on the desk. It is not printed, I am informed. No one knows exactly what the real story is. We are faced with a flat take-it-or-leave-it proposition.

It breaks my heart to think that we are going to have to legislate on such a serious matter—serious to our own farmers, serious to our friends and allies particularly in Latin America, and serious with respect to our international relations with Cuba—when we are faced with a take-it-or-leave-it proposal.

As I said before, I am a practical man. I will take it, but I do not like it. I do it reluctantly.

If a substitute should be offered, I reserve the right to vote for that. I think it is a sad commentary on our state of affairs, when we have to consider proposed legislation such as this.

I do not depreciate the work which has been done tonight in an attempt to resolve the apparent impasse. It is a sad state of affairs when we have to involve so many people in our international relations on such scanty and flimsy evidence, such flimsy facts and scanty facts as we have before us tonight.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. The situation might be stated somewhat as follows: All of us realize the desirability of the possibility of cutting down the present quotas on sugar purchased from Cuba. The question arises as to how those reductions will be allocated. From where will the deficiency which will arise from those reductions be made up? How will the deficiency be made up?

The present proposal, in the form of the amendments of the Senator from New Mexico, provides that by legislative action, without the benefit of committee hearings and without the benefit of deliberation which is certainly reasonably forthcoming from a body such as this, we shall make a decision, by action of the Senate and the House.

The alternative proposed is to put the discretion in the hands of the President, who will, in the calm deliberation of his office—in a calm deliberation other than the pressure under which we find ourselves at this time of night—make the decision as to how the reduction will be made up.

Is that not about the sum and substance of the entire situation?

Mr. ALLOTT. That is about the sum and substance of the situation.

One of the great objections of those who have opposed the proposed legislation for the past 6 months, and who have kept it tied up in one way or another in the House of Representatives, has been that they could not see surrendering the powers of the Congress to cut the quota of sugar for Cuba.

As I read the language—and I refer Senators to page 4, line 16, to which the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] referred a while ago—I think the language goes further than to give the President the power to cut. I think the word "may" makes it possible for the President to readjust quotas as between countries, within certain limits. So it is even a little beyond what the Senator has described.

I thank the Senator for his contribution.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I regreat to say that I shall oppose the amendments offered by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Four years ago I was instrumental in obtaining more than 50 Senators to sponsor the present Sugar Act. In the early part of last year, in the 1st session of the 86th Congress, I submitted another bill to extend the present Sugar Act. For many months during the first session of the Congress I made many efforts to have the Committee on Agriculture of the House, which handles sugar legislation, consider and report a bill to extend the present sugar law. Instead of acting immediately, or even with reasonable speed, the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture—in fact, the entire committee—saw fit to postpone action.

Tonight we are working under heavy pressure—actually, under duress. The House bill came to this body yesterday. I understand that the majority leader held the bill at the desk, in the hope that it could be considered before the recess and before the bill was referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, everyone knows the trouble we have encountered in getting the House bill before us. Everybody knowns the Senate cannot originate sugar legislation—that the Senate cannot take action on a sugar bill unless the bill originates in the House.

It is true that we can attach a sugar bill to a bill which comes from the Finance Committee, but under the rules of the House, the question of germaneness maybe raised. Usually a bill of that character, when sent to the House from the Senate, would be sent directly to the Committee on Agriculture, if it included a sugar bill. Under these circumstances we would probably again be confronted with an unreasonable delay.

Mr. President, as has been pointed out by several Senators, we have a vehicle now before us. We can consider that bill, when we return in August. We can hold hearings on it. We can consider the bill in the Senate, pass the bill, and send it to conference. We can do that within perhaps a week or a week and a half.

However, if the bill which we are now considering is sent to the House merely for the purpose of giving the President the short-term authority which some Senators believe he should have, we are going to lose the only available vehicle by which we can later, after the recess, obtain effective sugar legislation on a long-range basis. Let us not forget that the amendment which is now proposed would not extend the Sugar Act, but would merely amend it so as to give the President the power to deal with Mr. Castro. The act would still expire December 31, 1960.

I believe our failure to preserve the House-passed bill as a vehicle for a real extension of the act after the recess will seriously jeopardize the sugar program. I say this with the full and complete realization that the House is adamant—at least certain Members of the House Committee on Agriculture are adamant.

I attended several conferences and made many suggestions as to how the matter could be handled, but what was I told by the proponents of the measure in the House? "Take our bill or nothing."

That is the kind of answer that I received. I expect the same thing to happen when we meet here in August. My guess is that the House will again delay the passage of a sugar bill until the last minute, and then send to us their own bill and say, "Take this or get nothing." That is the problem with which we are confronted today.

There is another point which I want to emphasize—it was raised by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and several other Senators—and that is in regard to the allocation of any quota which may be taken away from Cuba. It is true that the pending language affects only the 1960 sugar crop but it does affect the foreign full-duty countries which would be in line to benefit should the President reduce the Cuban quota. The quotas of these countries could be increased out of the Cuban quota reduction, and if that should be done, the increased amounts would be the quotas they will expect and demand in the future. Thus, instead of having only Cuba to deal with, we will, I fear, have perhaps four, five, or six of our neighbors to the south of us taking jabs at us.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. Would that not ultimately result perhaps in harm to our own cane and sugar beet growers?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no doubt about that. I fear that those who will ultimately suffer the most are our domestic growers, under this proposal.

Suppose that scoundrel in Cuba is deposed next week, or in a month and a half, or 2 months from now. Ways and means will have to be found to restore to Cuba any portion of her quota which the President may have taken away from her and given to other countries under the bill.

Let us not forget that 42 percent of the sugar which is now being produced in Cuba is owned and controlled by Americans. Does any Senator wish to do our own people violence? Yet, that is what would be done under this bill.

Furthermore, if this bill passes, we shall find ourselves in more trouble, when the bearded Cuban demagog is deposed. We shall be in trouble with those countries which received the Cuban quota; they will demand those increases permanently. We shall simply have compounded our troubles. Instead of having to deal, as I said, with one "Cuba" or one "South or Central American country," we may well be confronted with five, six, or seven.

We are told that unless we act tonight, the President may call us into session next Tuesday. What if we do return later? There is no iron-clad reason why we must recess or adjourn now. This is an important measure, and, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to stay here all next week and settle it and not pass a resolution that will put us deeper and deeper into trouble with our friends to the south of us.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. When the last Sugar Act was passed, the House of Representatives tried to make some minor adjustments in the quota for the small Caribbean countries, and the State Department at that time told us that if we went along with the juggling that the House of Representatives tried to do in that bill as reported by the House committee and sent to us, it would create such chaos in our relations with Central America that there would be no way to handle the situation. It would be absolutely impossible to get along with them for some time to come.

I remind the Senator that the proposed legislation was not drawn by the State Department. It was drawn, I assume, by the chairman of the House committee, and the kind of thing we have here goes 100 times as far as the House tried to go some years ago when the State Department said it would absolutely destroy our relations with all of South and Central America if the measure was passed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Under the bill, as I see it, 85 percent of this balance may be distributed among all the countries of South and Central America that produce sugar and are not receiving any preference, as is Cuba, Mexico, Peru, and several others.

I say that if the President next week, for example, should remove a million or a million and a half tons from Cuba's quota, and let all those countries share in the quota so removed, it will simply mean that those countries will expect to retain their increased quotas in the future. That is what they will expect.

The resolution that we presented today was a very simple one, and I am surprised and thoroughly disappointed that the House refused to accept it. The day before yesterday—since it is now 12:30, after midnight—after we had several conferences. Some of us made every effort to have the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the House, and other members of that committee agree to our resolution. We suggested that they either permit us to introduce one, or that they introduce such a resolution, giving the President the power to deal with Dr. Castro.

What we had in mind was to permit the President to purchase on the open market such sugars as may be needed for our domestic consumption, not by way of allocation, as the bill provides, but simply to go on the open market and purchase the sugar.

They did not want that. They said, "You take our bill or you have nothing."

Mr. President, I do not like that kind of challenge, and so far as I am concerned, I am willing to stay here and not recess at all until this matter is dealt with, if the President thinks it is that important.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I think the Senator from Louisiana is to be commended for the very sound analysis he has given to this problem from the standpoint of America's foreign relations. All we can do in these wee hours is to try to get the situation before the Senate in the hope that the Senate will take the time to analyze the very important implications that the Senator raises.

Let us consider a point or two that I wish to stress. The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate has had conferences during the past several months with the State Department upon the sugar problem. I wish to say that in none of those conferences has the State Department come forward with any such a proposal as we find in the House bill tonight. I haven't had time to consult with all the members of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, but such of my associates on that subcommittee are in the Senate tonight and I have talked to them about the problem.

I think I report accurately when I say that we think it is highly desirable to adopt a simple general resolution such as the Senator from Louisiana is pleading for and that I pleaded for earlier. I serve notice on the Senate that the parliamentary situation is such that the Anderson amendment has priority. We will have to act on it one way or another. We will have to vote it up or down.

Whether we accept it or reject it, an amendment in the form of a substitute will be in order. I serve notice now that after action is taken on the Anderson amendment I shall offer a substitute which will read as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1948, as amended, the President shall determine the quota for Cuba under such act for the balance of the year 1960 in such amount or amounts as he shall find from time to time to be in the national interest.

I believe that when that amendment goes before the House in the proper form in which it will then be—because our previous resolution was found to be faulty from a procedural standpoint—the House will be able to give some consideration to the problems the Senator from Louisiana has raised.

I ask Senators to pay attention to the countries that I now name, Brazil, Venezuela, Colombia, Guatemala, El Salvador, and Ecuador. These countries are already very much concerned about the course of action that is being proposed on the floor of the Senate tonight.

It is important, as the Senator from Louisiana says, that we bring these problems before our committees. This will permit us to bring State Department officials in to testify upon the problems, and to give us the benefit of their advice. Otherwise what we may do here tonight on the bill as it comes to us from the House, can be to create, in my judgment, and, as the Senator has pointed out, some very serious problems with countries to the south of us.

We cannot afford to be considered an Indian giver. We cannot say, "We allowed this quota only for a temporary period of time." Once these countries obtain the benefit, they will resent any taking of it away. They will, I repeat, resent our taking those quotas away. The countries which do not get any quota under the Anderson amendment are going to resent that fact too. We would be creating a misunderstanding.

We can take care of the situation, however, by the simple amendment that I shall offer as a substitute for the Anderson amendment, irrespective of whether we vote the Anderson amendment up or down.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. We have heard a great deal of talk about fiscal responsibility and fiscal irresponsibility. If we take what is before us, it will be irresponsible. We have before us a bill which the Finance Committee has not had an opportunity to look at. I undertook to look at the analysis of it. I asked one of the pages to get me a copy of what Senators have been reading from. He said it was not available. What are we going to vote on? I have before me a mimeographed page from the office of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON]. It is an explanation or brief analysis of the bill. This is all I can find, but I have already been told that the memorandum does not accurately describe what the Senator from New Mexico is offering. That shows how little we know what we are voting on.

This measure proposes to take Cuba's quota and distribute it to other countries that at present have quotas. What is the quota that Cuba gets? It is over 3 million tons. Let us take a look at the other countries together. How much do they get? Two hundred seventy-eight thousand. They get about 7 percent of what Cuba gets. That is according to this memorandum. If we take Cuba's quota, we proceed to redistribute it on the basis of Peru, the Dominican Republic, and Mexico getting almost 90 percent of all of Cuba's quota. Mexico might be able to fill a substantial portion of it, but it would be difficult for the others to do so. At what price would it be sold? At twice the world price. These people who are to be favored would expect to have vested rights in this additional quota, if I understand the memorandum. That is the best explanation I can find.

Yet I am advised that a copy of the amendment is not available. We passed a resolution which said that the President could work it out. I would prefer to let the President distribute it and buy all the sugar however he sees fit to buy for the next 30 days. That makes some sense. At least he would have someone's advice. Who is advising us? We cannot even get a copy of what we are voting on. Yet we are going to distribute 3 million tons on an annual basis based on some sort of formula that we do not understand or know anything about. We are told, "Do not worry about it."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have a memorandum from the files of my colleague [Mr. SMATHERS] which is based on information coming from the Sugar Division of the Department of Agriculture. It deals with the quota and the balance of the unfilled quota, which I believe will give the Senator figures which he may want to use rather than the full-year quota figures which he has been using.

According to this memorandum, the sugar quota for Cuba this year is 3,119,655 tons. The total unfilled quota at this time is 830,000 tons.

The memorandum states that Cuba has not delivered the 830,000 tons, but that plans are being made to deliver every ton of this sugar before Congress gets back in August. Such action would seriously affect the market, since the market is loaded and the refineries are full.

In addition to the 830,000 tons, which is the balance of the unfilled quota for Cuba for this year, there are two other factors mentioned in the memorandum. It states that Cuba's share of the deficit amounts to 161,800 tons, which will go to Cuba very shortly, unless someone is given authority to prevent it. That would be a second bonanza for Cuba. One hundred sixty-one thousand eight hundred tons is the second one, and a very considerable one. The total of those two make practically 1 million tons, with a value of about $100 million, which Cuba will receive by way of bonanzas in the next few weeks, unless the President is given authority to deal effectively with this matter.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. That is just the kind of proposal that I advocate, to give the President the power to deal with it. Why should we assign quotas? I have the privilege of serving on the Committee on Finance, which will have jurisdiction of this subject if it gets to the committee. I would be interested in looking into it. For us to attempt to reassign quotas without having any concept of how they are to be reassigned seems to me to be ridiculous. I would rather turn it over to the President than vote in the dark, as we are asked to do, with only a few people knowing who would be benefited. These countries have lobbyists working on the House side, and no doubt they have had the benefit of some knowledge on these points, but we have not been able to study the question at all. I would prefer to tell the President, "Go ahead and buy sugar on any basis you please."

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BENNETT. Earlier in our discussion the majority leader expressed the opinion that the sugar bill could be attached to a House-passed bill. I should like to inquire whether the resolution may be properly attached to a House-passed bill which has come to us and has been assigned to the Finance Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that it can be, because there is no question of germaneness.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, under the circumstances, I suggest that we might consider attaching this resolution to another House passed bill, and thus leave the sugar bill where it is, reposing in the Committee on Finance, and not risk not being able to get a bill to handle when we come back in August.

Mr. ELLENDER. Such a suggestion would, of course, meet one of the main objections I raised a while ago. However, if we did that, it would be useless, because the House would be adament in saying, "You will send us our bill, or you will get nothing." And that is what we would get.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I think it is important that we legislate on sugar in the near future. It seems to me it would be the part of wisdom for the Senate to rescind its recess resolution, that this measure be referred to the committee for 2 or 3 days, and that we complete the legislation next week.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to modify my amendment so that I may meet the point raised by the senior Senator from Louisiana and the junior Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, on page 4, line 3, I propose to strike out "shall first" and insert in lieu thereof "may."

On page four, line 11, strike out "shall next" and insert in lieu thereof "may."

That would leave the matter completely within the jurisdiction of the President of the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. But he will not have the power to purchase.

Mr. ANDERSON. He will have the power to purchase.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Mexico send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. ELLENDER. I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to the fact that on page 3 the President would be empowered to deal with the Cuban quota, and if he should decide to take away any amount that he desires, so far as that goes, it shall be apportioned as follows, and I quote:

> First, there shall be allotted to other foreign countries for which quotas are assigned, or portions thereof, not less than 3,000 or more than 10,000 short tons, so that any country receiving from 3,000 tons to 10,000 tons may all receive 10,000 tons.

The resolution which we originally proposed dealt with the problem in this manner: We sought to give the President the power to deal with the Cuban quota, and in the next section we gave him the power to go into the open market and buy sugar from wherever he could buy it, without in any manner making it possible for the countries from whom we purchased to believe that we were giving them an allocation of sugar. We would buy on the open market, the same as anybody else would buy from those foreign countries.

As certainly as we pass the resolution, we shall give ourselves more trouble than we now have. We will only multiply our troubles with the countries of South America and Central America. They are very, very sensitive people. They cannot be made to understand why it is that we allocate to them 10,000 tons this year, and give them the right to sell that and obtain a 2-cent differential, and then the next year take it away from them. They will not understand that.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he has any copies of the proposed bill on that side of the aisle? I am being accused of having the only copy available on this side of the aisle.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have a committee print of the House bill.

Mr. AIKEN. Good. Then there are two copies.

Mr. MORSE. There are only two on the floor of the Senate, I am advised.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield the floor for the time being.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana, who is chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, if he believes it would be a practical solution to this problem, and would serve the immediate purposes of the moment, if we merely struck everything in the House sugar bill as it came over and substituted the language of the Senate resolution which we sent to the House today, or yesterday, or whenever it was, with respect to the authority of the President.

Mr. ELLENDER. I would much prefer that, except that in so doing we will lose the only vehicle we have with which to write a sugar bill when we return in August.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes; I understand.

Mr. ELLENDER. What will happen, as I pointed out, is that there will be delays on the part of the House. The House will wait, just as surely as I am speaking, until perhaps 2 days before Labor Day, which will be about when we might expect to adjourn, put a bill on the desk, and say, "Pass that or get nothing." That is what will happen again. That, to me, is one of the main reasons why we should not use this bill tonight in order to do what the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and other Senators have proposed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, we have three segments of government to consider with reference to this proposal. The first is the House, where it originated. The House has some pride about it. That was evidenced by the resolution they sent over, lecturing us on their constitutional prerogatives and the evasion of those prerogatives by the Senate. That is not unusual. I remember all the speeches I made on the House floor when I was a Member, and how I used to scold the Senate, as my distinguished friend, Representative ANDERSON remembers. He served with me and remembers well how we stood on our prerogative and scolded the Senate.

Still, we must be mindful of the fact that the House has sent us a bill. We cannot simply take the position that the Senate will entirely dictate what will happen in this field. That is the first point.

Second, the President and the State Department have some interest in this matter. I have talked with representatives of the State Department. They think we have this measure in reasonably good shape, notwithstanding all the speculations as to its impact on foreign policy and what it may do to our relationships with Latin American countries. I can say that with knowledge and with authority now.

We have the President to consider. I think I can speak with knowledge on that subject, after a discussion with the White House not too long ago. This bill would be acceptable. All of those factors must be considered if we plan to tear the bill apart.

Second, I point out that we forget that we are amending the title of the bill. As it came from the House, it was to extend for 1 year the Sugar Act of 1948, as amended. The title has been amended, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. It reads: "To Amend the Sugar Act of 1948, as Amended." We do not extend the act which dies on December 31 of this year. We merely amend it, and then we will give further attention to the matter when we return on August 8, after the recess.

The third thing I point out is that we give the President the power, notwithstanding the provisions of title 2, for the remainder of 1960, from now, during the existence of the Sugar Act and no further, to deal with the Cuban situation.

The President may do one thing or another, but this I know: The intensity of his feeling on this subject, because of the deterioration of that condition, is such that he is quite insistent that he have a weapon with which to deal with the situation before Congress goes home.

If we fail to do so, assuming, of course, that it is constitutionally appropriate and correct, the President will call us back. I believe I can say that tonight on the Senate floor with authority, and with the approval of the White House, because evidently the executive department is in possession of information with respect to Cuba which we do not possess. That is the reason why there is such an intensity of feeling on this subject.

So something must be done. If we do not do it tonight—assuming, of course, that the House waits on us—then of course we shall have to do it next week—either on Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday, or sometime before we leave Washington. That is just as certain as it is certain that I am standing in the Senate of the United States tonight.

Next, we struck out some of these complicated provisions.

And then—in line with the new suggestions offered by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, a onetime very distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, who was the Secretary of Agriculture when I was chairman of the House Subcommittee on Agriculture, and had to deal with him on this very subject, as he so very well knows—what we do: If we are going to cut a quota somewhere and if we are going to make provision for providing sugar for the American people, we have to find a deficit. Where shall we find it? The bill first said "shall first be allocated to other foreign countries." By means of the amendment, that has now been modified to say that it "may first be allocated to other foreign countries." That takes care of the five countries enumerated by the Senator from Oregon.

The next amendment is to change, on page 4, in subparagraph (ii) the word "shall" to "may", so there "may next be apportioned to the Republic of the Philippines 15 per centum of the remainder of such importation." That puts the discretion into the hands of the President.
